Religion and immigration in the United States
Gérard-François Dumont

To cite this version:

HAL Id: halshs-01150233
https://halshs.archives-ouvertes.fr/halshs-01150233
Submitted on 9 May 2015

HAL is a multi-disciplinary open access archive for the deposit and dissemination of scientific research documents, whether they are published or not. The documents may come from teaching and research institutions in France or abroad, or from public or private research centers.

L’archive ouverte pluridisciplinaire HAL, est destinée au dépôt et à la diffusion de documents scientifiques de niveau recherche, publiés ou non, émanant des établissements d’enseignement et de recherche français ou étrangers, des laboratoires publics ou privés.
Religions and Immigration in the United States

by Gérard-François DUMONT

In all countries, the number of people counted as members of various religions evolves according to the number of individuals who claim their membership in a certain religion and those who distance themselves from a religion. In the United States this type of evolution is particularly dependent on immigration, which causes important changes in the repartition of the religious population.

In considering the religious repartition in the most populous country of America, the Christian religion continues to dominate, since three-quarters of the U.S. population consider themselves “Christian”, while 15% declare “without religion”, 3.9% declare a “non-Christian religion”, 5.2% give no response. (12.4% and 9.7% respectively), while the number of Protestants increased less than the national increase (7% versus 9.7% respectively). One element which explains this evolution, favorable to the Catholics, is the Latin-American and Philippine immigrations, which are composed largely of Catholics.

Within the category of Protestant religions, this migratory phenomenon also has an effect. (Other factors may also play a role, such as the abandoning of a religion, for the group indicating “without religion” increased by 13.6%). In fact, along with certain Protestant religions (evangelical, Pentecostal and Adventist) and Jehovah’s Witnesses, which all increase their numbers chiefly by conversion, the rise in Orthodox Christians (27.8%) should be noted. This is the result mainly of immigration from the countries of Orthodox Europe, following the collapse of the Iron Curtain. On the contrary, the Lutherans (-9.5%), the Presbyterians (-15.6%), and the Anglicans (-30.3%) are all on the decrease, these religions being implanted in countries which furnish almost no more immigrants to the U.S., namely, Sweden, Germany, and the United Kingdom.

Furthermore, in addition to the migratory phenomenon should be noted a higher-than-average birth rate among the Mennonites (26.6%) and the Mormons (17.1%).

As for non-Christian religions, their members increased more (13.6%) than both the national increase and that of the Christian churches. Within this sub-category, sharp differences should also be noted: In effect, growth of the Sikhs from India is very high (36.8%) even though their actual numbers remain small (78,000 in 2008). The rise is less dramatic for the Muslims (22.2%), but their actual number is higher (1,349,000), due to immigrations coming in particular from the Indian subcontinent, from the Middle East (in particular Lebanon) and the Muslim countries of sub-Saharan Africa, for example, Senegal. The number of Buddhists showed an increase (9.9%) just slightly above the national increase, but with an important minority, with 1,189,000 members. On the contrary, the number of Jews diminishes (-5.5%) to stabilize at 2,680,000 in 2008. It is true that the large waves of Jewish immigration to the United States, a result of the pogroms of the late 19th and early 20th centuries in Europe, then the Shoah, and finally the expulsion of the Jews from the Arab countries, such as Egypt in 1956, are finished. On the other hand, American Jews can make their aliyah (ascension), that is, emigrate to Israel, an emigration which has been greatly facilitated by the Law of Return voted in 1950 by Israel and which gives all Jews the right to immigrate to Israel and to become citizens.

Thus, an analysis of religions in the United States sheds some light on the migratory system of this country. Noteworthy is the fact that the Chinese immigration is not shown; on the one hand it may be that this immigration has been divided among various religions and, on the other hand, 11.2 million inhabitants of the United States chose not to answer the question. (translation: C. Knutson-Beveraggi)