The French Institute of Pondicherry (IFP), UMIFRE 21 CNRS-MAE, is a financially autonomous institution under the joint supervision of the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MAE) and the French National Centre of Scientific Research (CNRS). It is part of the network of 27 research centres under this Ministry. It also forms part of the research unit 3330 “Savoirs et Mondes Indiens” of the CNRS, along with the Centre de Sciences Humaines (CSH) in New Delhi. It fulfils missions of research, expertise and training in Human and Social Sciences and Ecology in South Asia. It works particularly in the fields of Indian cultural knowledge and heritage (Sanskrit language and literature, history of religions, Tamil studies...), contemporary social dynamics and the natural ecosystems of South India.

The mission of The French School of Asian Studies (EFEO), founded in 1900 in Hanoi and today under the aegis of the French Ministry of Higher Education and Research, is to study the classical civilisations of Asia. Stretching from India, in the West, across the whole of South-East Asia to China and Japan, the EFEO's research areas cover most of the societies which have been 'Indianised' or 'Sinicised' over the course of history. A network of international scholars working at the EFEO's seventeen centres and branch offices, which are spread across twelve Asian countries, has been essential in the development of the School's research programme. Interdisciplinary projects bring together scholars in the fields of anthropology, archaeology, history, philology, and religious studies. In Pondicherry, the projects of the EFEO focus mainly on classical Indology: Sanskrit, Old Tamil, History, and History of art and of religions.

L'École française d'Extrême-Orient (EFEO), fondée en 1900 à Hanoï, est un établissement relevant du ministère français de l'Enseignement supérieur et de la Recherche dont la mission scientifique est l'étude des civilisations classiques de l'Asie. Son champ de recherches s'étend de l'Inde à la Chine et au Japon et, englobant l'ensemble du Sud-Est asiatique, comprend la plupart des sociétés qui furent indianisées ou sinisées au cours de l'histoire. Autour de ses dix-sept centres et antennes, installés dans douze pays d'Asie, se sont constitués des réseaux de chercheurs locaux et internationaux sur lesquels l'École a pu s'appuyer pour construire son essor. L'EFEO aborde l'Asie par des recherches pluridisciplinaires et comparatistes, associant l'archéologie, l'histoire, l'anthropologie, la philologie et les sciences religieuses. À Pondichéry, les projets de l'EFEO portent essentiellement sur l'indologie classique : sanskrit, tamoul ancien, histoire, histoire de l'art et des religions.

NETamil Series

Classical Tamil is among the oldest literary traditions of the Indian sub-continent, one that reaches back to the first centuries CE and that produced many literary, devotional and theoretical works for more than a thousand years.

The palm-leaf manuscripts at our disposal for the study of this literature are, at best, approximately three-hundred years old, and the paper manuscripts for the most part are more recent still. In sharp contrast with current printed editions, these manuscripts exhibit an often bewildering degree of textual variation, from simple variants and occasional glosses to wide-ranging commentaries, many of which still await a first publication.

This wealth of primary material is inexorably yielding to the ravages of the sub-tropical climate and are for the most part not even properly catalogued. With each crumbling leaf, our chances of arriving at an understanding of how the Tamil intellectual universe was construed and interacted with other parts of the Indian world diminish.

Since 2012, an international team of scholars in India and in Europe has been studying these materials from the early stages of digitisation through collation to studies of codicology, text-critical analysis and cultural history.

The aim of this NETamil Series, the direct outcome of their endeavour, is to present significant studies in the field, and thereby to attempt to reconstruct the processes of interaction and transmission that took place prior to the putative 'Tamil renaissance' of the 19th century.

This series is published with the generous funding of the European Research Council within the framework of the NETamil Project – Going from Hand to Hand – Networks of Intellectual Exchange in the Tamil Learned Traditions (ERC Advanced Grant no. 339470).

Preface

The present volume on the Antāti-s goes back to a reading group consisting of Marcus Schmücker and myself that started in summer 2011 with the idea of producing a readable but moderately correct German translation of these early texts of Vaiṣṇava devotional poetry in the Tamil language. Over the next couple of years we worked on this for a couple of days whenever we happened to be in the same place – Hamburg, Vienna, Pondicherry. The first version, accordingly, consisted in three hundred German verses. However, the group and its plans extended over the years into the NETamil Vaiṣṇava group and the scheme of retranslating the whole of the Tivyappirapantam into English, with proper philological annotation, a complete glossary-cum-concordance and, as it turned out, the germs of a new edition. What a critical edition might look like in the case of a work of this genre, with probably something like a hundred devout and not particularly accurate manuscripts, will have to be discussed in the years to come. The common endeavour anyway has started to bear fruit: Suganya Anandakichenin has published her volume on Kulacēkara Ālvār, Lynn Ate's volume on the smaller works of Tirumaṅkai is out, and most of the other parts of the Four-Thousand are under preparation and more or less advanced.

In this volume, the English translations have been produced by Eva Wilden, discussed in detail with Marcus Schmücker. She is also responsible for the edition, the annotation, the appendixes and the glossary. The epilogue on theological concepts has been written by Marcus Schmücker.

Thanks go, first of all, to the group, especially to Suganya Anandakichenin and Erin McCann who participated in many reading sessions and made many suggestions for improvement, and to Lynn Ate for going over the English, but also to Charlotte Schmid, Leslie Orr, Katherine Young and S.A.S. Sarma, for the many discussions on points of Vaiṣṇava tradition, poetry, iconography, ritual and theology. We are grateful to the EFEO for its beautiful collection of Vaiṣṇava manuscripts, to Mr. Sathi Patel for his typesetting and, yet again, to the ERC who via the Advanced Grant NETamil financed this publication. One final word of thanks go to an anonymous reviewer who spotted a number of problematic passages and made many valuable suggestions.

Eva Wilden, Paris, July 2019

I. Introduction

I.1. Position in the Corpus and in the Tradition

The three old Tiruvantāti-s by Poykai-, Pūtam- and Pēyālvār form, together with the small oeuvre of Kāraikāmmaiyār on the Śaiva side, the earliest works of bhakti literature transmitted in Tamil, or in fact, for that matter, in the whole of India. Of course the late vestiges of the Caṅkam corpus contain religious material in the form of the Tirumurukārruppaṭai and the Paripāṭal, but, while a final word has not been spoken on the relative chronology – both might precede the codified bhakti works or might be roughly contemporaneous with them –, the Tirumurukārruppaṭai is the only work that has become part of two canons, the Caṅkam and the Śaiva one, and the Paripāṭal has been counted unequivocally as a Caṅkam work without being claimed by the Vaiṣṇavas (for its hymns to Tirumāl) or by the Kaumāras (for its hymns to Murukaṅ).

These three hundred-stanza texts form part of the third Thousand within the Nālāyirat Tivyappirapantam, the “Four-Thousand Divine Compositions” of the Śrīvaiṣṇava canon and are counted among its Iyaṟpā (“natural verses”). This designation refers to the fact that they are composed in the intermediate metre called Venṇpā, not yet in one of the multifarious metres of icai tamīl, “musical Tamil”, as is the major part of the canonical works. Accordingly, they cannot be “sung”¹ but only recited. They share the form called Antāti, an “end-beginning [poem]” – one of the pure Sanskrit genre terms that have no real Sanskrit counterpart within the kāvya corpus – with the Arputat Tiruvantāti of Kāraikkālammaiār: the word or phrase at the end of each stanza is taken up and repeated, with minor modifications and possibly a different meaning, at the beginning of the next, while the last word of the whole is found in the very beginning of the first verse. Also, within the corpus itself there are parallels, slightly later according to tradition, namely the fourth Tiruvantāti by Tirumaḷicai² and the Periya Tiruvantāti by Nammālvār, in addition to which there are numerous works, such as the Tiruvāymoli, that are not named Antāti-s but nevertheless follow the end-beginning principle.

The three authors are as legendary as the rest of the Ālvārs, originally probably “Lords”, but traditionally “those who are immersed in god” [Palaniappan 2004]. Their story is told in the hagiographical works, beginning with the Divyasūricarita and the Kuruparamparāprapāvam and in brief can be summarised as follows: on a very rainy evening, in Tirukōyilūr, Poykaiyālvār sought shelter from the rain on the porch of a temple, where he could just about lie down. After a while Pūtattālvār arrived and demanded entry. Where one man can lie, two may sit. So they sat, and again, after some time had passed, there came a third person, Pēyālvār. Where two men can sit three may stand, and they thus made room for him. As they were standing listening to the rain, an invisible fourth person arrived and squeezed in with them: in the morning all three of them were inspired by the love of the lord to compose their respective Antāti-s.

Śaiva one, but follows a kind of Vedic style chanting. For samples of Śaiva modes of performance, see for example the Digital Tēvāram.

² This fourth Antāti is often mentioned along with the first three; indeed it follows Pēyālvār’s text in the corpus, and many editions of Tivyappirapantam works group the four together in one volume (as do Muttukruṣṇanāyūtu 1901 and Kōvintasāmi Nāyūtu 1928); also Hardy’s classic study of 1983 conceives of them as a group. And it is true that there are parallels in form and metre, but language, content and poetic outlook are quite different (Suganya Anandakichenin is working on a full translation of Tirumaḷicai’s two works); the whole hagiographical tradition links the former three Ālvārs together into one story, while Tirumaḷicai receives a separate chapter.

This is not the place to inquire into the legend, its antecedents and possible basis in historical truth. What actually can be known is this: the names of the three authors are not mentioned in the works themselves – the three Tiruvantāti-s lack the signature verses so frequently found with bhakti texts – but are found in the taṇṇiyaṇ-s, the solitary stanzas that are transmitted at the beginning of each text and respectively ascribed to one Mutaliyāṇṭaṇ, to Tirukurukaippirāṇ Piḷḷāṇ and to Kurukai Kāvalappaṇ. Clearly none of the three names when stripped of the honorific Ālvār – Poykai, Pūtam and Pēy – is a “normal” proper name, but they might be designations referring to certain practices of penance and/or meditation. The literal meaning of poykai is simply “pond”, which makes one think of a type of penance that includes standing in water, while pūtam and pēy are two words for classes of demonic beings, the latter shared by Kāraikkālammaiṇār as a word of self-reference.³ In her case it

uraiyiṇāl immālai antāti veṇṇpāk
karaiviṇāṇ kāraikkāl pēy col – paravuvār ārāta aṇṇiṇōṭ’ aṇṇalaic ceṇr’ ēttuvār is reminiscent of the fact that she has given up worldly life and wanders as an ascetic in the service of her god. The same might have been the case with the early Ālvārs.

A number of more or less tangible facts may be gleaned from a text-internal perspective. It seems a reasonable goal to establish the mythological, ritual and theological elements that have become the building blocks for the poetic content, as has been done summarily in 25 pages by Hardy 1983: 281-307. An additional line of inquiry is based on the temples and places mentioned in the verses of the Antāti-s, likewise pursued by Hardy and summarised in his map 2 that shows the possible geographic area covered by the authors of what he termed the four early Antāti-s. The most promising line, however, is a philological lens that takes into account the lexicon, morphology and syntax of these three hundred stanzas, along with the poetic techniques they employ, and avoids reading into texts from perhaps the 6th century the theological interpretations that were made in the later Śrīvaiṣṇava school. This will allow us to gain a more precise idea of the Antāti-s' place in internal chronology vis-à-vis the rest of the corpus but also in early Tamil literature in general, beginning with the Caṅkam corpus.

I.2 Content Material: Designations, Incarnations, and Mythic Episodes

The elements used as building blocks to compose the texts can be regarded under two different but complementary perspectives, content and form. The former has already been done several times (cf. Hardy 1983) and can be dealt with summarily; the latter has been mostly neglected, and thus form will be described in detail under 1.5 and 1.6. From the point of view of content, the material employed consists in designations and epithets of the deity (cf. appendix 1 for all the references), in more or less terse allusions to mythic episodes, most of them based on North-Indian narrative mythology⁴ (cf. appendix 2 for all the references), and in a variety of manners of approaching the deity, either on a personal level (yoga, meditation) or in the form of temple cult (pūjā), both to be treated in section 1.3.

With respect to the designations, as has been pointed out several times by Katherine Young [Young 2007: 181f.], that the actual official “Northern” name of Viṣṇu (Tamil viṭṭu or viṇṇu) is extremely rare in the Tamil Vaiṣṇava canon, and that it does not occur at all in the Antāti-s. However, as a point of convenience, it shall be used here in order to refer to the unifying idea behind all the different names in part based on different incarnations. As for incarnations, the Southern tradition, at least at this early stage, does not follow the modern list of ten avatāra-s:

1. matsya, “fish”
2. kūrma, “tortoise”
3. varāha, “boar”
4. narasiṃha, “man-lion”
5. vāmana, “dwarf”

⁴ As far as concrete text sources are concerned, in the absence of any direct information one can only compare mythic episodes and their details, in part a hazardous undertaking, on the one hand because the verse fragments referring to them are in part very short and allusive, on the other hand because puranic and epic sources often contain multiple versions of the same episode. Hardy (ib. p. 49-115) devotes his Part Two to early Northern Indian sources on the devotion of Kṛṣṇa, that is, the Mahābhārata including the Gītā and the Harivaṃśa, the Brahmā- and Viṣṇupurāṇa; he also considers the kāvya tradition. For more recent attempts at unravelling the relationship between the Tamil and the Sanskrit sources for particular mythic episodes, see Narayanan 1994 and Schmid 1999 and 2013. As for the more theoretical genres, references to dogmatic/ritual practices and to systems such as Pañcarātra or Vaikhānasa are too vague to allow for a certain identification.

6. paraśurāma, “Rāma with the axe”
7. rāma, “Rāma”
8. kṛṣṇa, “Kṛṣṇa”
9. buddha, “Buddha”
10. kalkin, the incarnation as yet to come

The Antāti-s, as far as I can see,⁵ know of only five, namely boar (Tamil ēṇam, kēḷal or varākam), man-lion (ari or naraciṅkam), dwarf (vāmaṇ or vāmaṇaṇ),⁶ Rāma (irāmaṇ) and Kṛṣṇa (kaṇṇaṇ),⁷ with a strong preponderance for Kṛṣṇa and freely mixed with allusions to the cosmic Nārāyaṇa (in Tamil nārāyaṇaṇ, but most often contracted to nāraṇaṇ), as a child on the banyan leaf or as a god on the serpent bed, treated on a par with the other five. The most frequent names, however, are the ones inherited from the Caṅkam corpus [Hardy 1983: 117-238] and related to his dark colour (māl, māyaṇ).⁸ As such, they should be referring to Kṛṣṇa-Kaṇṇaṇ, and they certainly were the point of conver-

⁵ Hardy’s list (ib., p. 286) also refers to kūrma, but without clear indication of the passage he had in mind.

⁷ Further names and patronyms borrowed from Sanskrit are kēcavaṇ, mātavaṇ, yātavaṇ.

⁸ Further extensions of these are tirumāl, neṭumāl, māyavaṇ and kariyaṇ, while the earlier familiar form of māyōṇ is not found.

gence for the identification of the old Māl with Kṛṣṇa, but within the Antāti-s the range of application is wider, even though more detailed investigation would be needed in order to determine just how wide.

A whole further range of epithets is based on qualities. The most frequent one is comparative colour (ocean-, cloud, sapphire colour and so forth), followed by physical attributes (eyes, feet, crown, chest with the Tulsi garland or with Śrī), by weapons (the discus, the bow) and by iconographic features (the conch, the bird, the snake bed). Numerous as well are the titles of lord, king, god and father. Only one name of the god is based on a toponym, namely vēṅkaṭattān, the one from the holy mountain of Vēṅkaṭa (Tirupati). References to deeds and exploits are ubiquitous: the more familiar and frequent ones have been collected and specified in appendix 2, while the rarer and more illusive ones also have been treated in the footnotes to the translations.

I.3 Theology and Ritual

This brief section too cannot hope to go much beyond Hardy, although on a few points my approach differs from his. The main problem I see is his idea of a well-established chronology which puts the Caṅkam corpus as a whole neatly before the bhakti works. It is mainly for this reason that he finds iconic temple worship already configured when the bhakti period starts. However, I believe neither that we have firm reason to put Kalittokai, Paripāṭal and Tirumurukāṟruppaṭai before the Antāti-s, nor that all the poems in the earlier anthologies, most notably the Akanānūru and the Puranānūru, precede our early Ālvārs; on the contrary, a number of poems clearly already presuppose a bhakti pantheon and modes of worship alien to the earlier religion.⁹ And anyway, first of all, we have to start with a caveat: the Antāti-s are non-sequential four-line poems not meant to expose doctrine, if indeed there was doctrine at such an early period, that is, somewhere around the 6th century and before the pervasive sectarian split between Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava, the fait accompli of which is the two canons. Just as for the mythic episodes present in epithets and allusions, elements of doctrine, cult and even location appear in glimpses and are not easy to nail down.

Absolutely striking are the similarities with Kāraikkālammaiār's Arputat Tiruvantāti. Many poems could freely be changed, in all these early Venṇā texts, from Śaiva to Vaiṣṇava and vice versa, just by changing a few attributes or mythical allusions. Why this should be so will become much clearer in section I.6 dealing with the poetic conventions. The situation brings to mind the wandering minstrels of the Caṅkam days who might sing for their dinner wherever they happened to find themselves at sunset, in this case, a Śaiva temple or a Vaiṣṇava temple.

Topoi of worship beyond pūjā, visualisation and meditation and the reduction of karma are connected with scriptural learning, specified as to the Veda (marai, vētam) – mostly just adduced as attributes or creation of the lord –, treatises (nūl, once used of the Śaiva scriptures), Mantras (mantiram), praise poems called word garlands (col-mālai) and names (peyar, pēr, nāmam). The “word garland” may refer to the Ālvār's own poem, namely in the famous beginning of Poykaiyālvār's Antāti (cf. also Pū. 74), although even poetry may be denigrated (Pū. 86). In two further passages the garland might rather be related to the recitation of names (Po. 57.3f., Pū. 85), perhaps associated with the Sanskrit Viṣṇusahasranāma, the title of which we find once in the Tamil translation āyiram pēr (Pū. 73.1). There is one isolated exhortation to renounce women so as to better keep one's mind on treatises (Pē. 14).

1.3.1 Temples and Temple Cult

As regards the temples mentioned not infrequently in the Antāti-s, we have to keep in mind that a dichotomy still current in discussions of bhakti literature, namely that between conservative, orthodox/orthoprax temple ritual and an individualised, personal and emotional relation to the god,¹⁰ is historically out of place here. The religion of the Caṅkam period was uniconic, and holy places were not constructed but natural (mountains, stones, trees) [Wilden 2013: 61-84]. It is precisely here in the Antāti texts, and in their parallels in the late Caṅkam and early Śaiva corpus, that temples and temple mountains as places of permanently established worship and the corresponding images of the deity first make their appearance.¹¹

As for locations – for a complete list of occurrences see appendix 3 – the one place mentioned with high frequency (38 times) is Vēṅkaṭam, modern Tirupati. It is referred to as a mountain, not as a temple, but it is definitely already an established place of worship, as is Iruñcōlai, although mentioned only twice (cf. māḷiruṅkunṛam from Paripāṭal 15). These two mark the furthest north-south range of the territory covered by the three early Ālvārs, except for one reference to the town of Taṅkāl which Hardy (ib., map 2) locates South of Madurai in the Pāṅṭiya land. All other (non-mythical) toponyms go to cities, presumably with temples and to specific temples within cities. The two cities mentioned with a modicum of frequency are Tiruvaraṅkam (Śrīraṅgam) with six occurrences and Kacci (Kāñcipuram), with twelve occurrences distributed between the place (two times) and three of its temples (Pāṭakam twice, Vekḱā five times, Vēḷukkai thrice). Mentioned four times is Kuṭantai (Kumpakōṇam, once Kuṭamūkkū), three times Kōṭṭi (Tirukōṭṭiyūr) and Kōval (Tirukōyilūr), twice Atti is found, one time each Kaṭikai, Tañcai (Tañcāvūr), Nīrmalai (Tirunīrmalai), Māmallai (Māmallapuram) and Tiruvallikkēṇi near Cennai. From the brief mentions available we cannot draw conclusions as to the structures – either in the form of buildings or of religious establishments – that might have been present. The one thing they have in common is that they possess iconic representations of the Lord (occasionally specified as to lying, sitting and standing postures) that are worshipped by pūjā: incense, flowers and flower garlands, praise poems, obeisance and prostration. There are occasional references to brahmins, the Veda and Vedic worship. The act of singing is as yet rarely mentioned, just verbal praise and recitation.

1.3.2 Images of the Deity

There appear to be basically two ways of seeing the deity, either with one's eyes or with one's heart, i.e., apart from physical representations in the temple there is the option of visualising one's god. Descriptions are poor in identifiable detail – what matters is not the individual image but the distinction of the deity among other deities, which is achieved by the attributes of quality already mentioned (the conch, the discus, etc.) or by allusion to his mythical deeds. The three postures (lying, sitting, standing) are mentioned twice, once with respect to the Veḷḷkā temple in Kāñci (Pē. 64) and once with respect to his position in the heart (Pē. 94); two references go to a standing image in Vēñkaṭam (Po. 39, Pū. 25), and one to a lying one in Tiruvaraṅkam (Po. 39). Descriptions of his physical beauty abound, but, apart from the colour (always dark like Kṛṣṇa, except for a few mentions of gold, which might rather be related to an icon), they are purely conventional (lotus eyes, lotus feet, etc.) and already overtly erotic, a point of heritage from the Akam tradition.

As for his association with other deities, he is often accompanied by Śrī (with a total of 28 mentions; for details see appendix 1), who either is to be found on his chest (Pē. 1.1 tiru kaṇṭēṇ), or is evoked as one of his wives, besides the Earth (three mentions) and the cowherdess Pinnai (two mentions). Only four passages appear to accord Śrī a more active role; she is once each described as a favorite (Po. 42.1f.), as an equal (Po. 86.1), as a mediator (Pū. 56), like in the later Śrīvaiṣṇava tradition, and as a refuge for the devotees (Pē. 100.4).

The two other gods he is often closely associated with are Brahmā and Śiva, and both may either be placed in physical proximity so that they form part of a particular manifestation, or they may be part of a group of gods engaged in the worship of Viṣṇu. Brahmā is, of course, in the first place, perceived as an emanation or creation of Viṣṇu, sitting in the lotus that rises from his navel (Po. 28.2f., 33.1, 56.3f. Pū. 37.1f.). The one exceptional motif is that of Brahmā washing Viṣṇu's feet, referring to a precise moment in the Vāmana incarnation, when the outstretched foot of Viṣṇu reaches Brahmā's world and the latter pours water on it (Pū. 68, Pē. 6.3f.). One passage is more ambiguous and may suggest the existence of Hari-Brahmā, namely Po. 60.1, where the two are linked by a simple sociative. A rather important role at the period seems to have been accorded to Hari-Hara, a motif taken up no less than six times and also traceable in slightly later Pallava iconography (Po. 5, 28.3f., 74, 98 Pē. 31.3f., 63).¹² Only one occurrence (Po. 15.1) evokes the triple deity called, in Sanskrit, trimūrti, but it remains abstract and does not allow the identification of the other two members.

Another familiar bhakti trope already present is the veneration of Viṣṇu on the part of the other gods. Only thrice a group of three worshippers is specified, interestingly not identical. Pu. 12 enumerates Brahmā, Śiva and Sūrya, while Pu. 17 and Pē. 97 make it Brahmā, Śiva and Indra.

I.4 A Step Towards Textual History

I.4.1 Editions

Given the fact that the Nālāyira Tivyappirapantam is the canonical root text of a religious group surviving and thriving up to this day, it is not surprising that there should be innumerable devout editions. Murdoch's catalogue of Tamil printed books from 1865 (p. 108) already lists it as: “nālāyirappirapantam 8vo.540 pp. 1R.”, giving no date and mentioning

¹² A Hari-Hara representation is found, for example, on the South side of the Kailāsanātha temple in Kāñci, dated to the early 8th century. The motif appears quite as important in the Śaiva parallel corpus, for example in Kāraikkālamaiyār's Arputat Tiruvantāti 41, suggesting that Śiva may share his body either with Viṣṇu or with Parvatī, i.e., he may either appear as Harihara or as Ardhanarīśvara (cf. also ATA 52, 58, 59, 83):

oru pāl ulak' aḷanta māl avaṇ ām marrai ~oru pāl umai ~avaḷ ām enrāl - iru pālum niṇ +uruvam āka niṇam teriya māṭṭōm-āl niṇ +uruvō miṇ +uruvō nērtu.

If one says: in one part he is Māl who measured the world, in another part she is Umā, as your form is both parts, we cannot be clear about the colour.
Is it rightly your form/colour or is it the form/colour of lightning?

the “Iyarpa” as the last part of the work. The choice of editions made here is to some degree arbitrary in that I was able to secure physical copies of them, but they appear to be fairly representative of the various types that can be found. They range from the old kind of careful edition of the single texts (combining the four Tiruvantāti-s, including that of Tirumaliçai, in one volume) with Periyavāccāṅ Piḷḷai’s Vyākhyānam over texts with modern paraphrases, glosses and commentaries to sandhi-split text-only pocket book versions.

The oldest I could find is Tarkkatīrttar Rāmānujācāryar and Si. Muttukruṣṇanāyūtu 1901. It displays a Tamil text with irregular cīr split and sandhi, without variants, followed by a paraphrase (patavurai within the text, pratipatam on the title page) produced by Tarkkatīrttar Rāmānujācāryar, followed by Periyavāccāṅ Piḷḷai’s Vyākhyānam (with grantha script for the Sanskrit quotations) and by an elucidation of difficult words (arumpata viḷakkam) on the part of Si. Muttukruṣṇanāyūtu(?), all separated by vertical lines on the page.

The second edition consulted is M.R. Kōvintasāmi Nāyūtu 1928, with a partly different cīr split and sandhi and occasionally different readings, followed by the editor’s patavurai, here in tabular form, and an “illumination of the divine meaning” (divyārṭtatīpikai) by Perumāḷ Kōyil Pirativāti Payaṅkāram Aṅṅaṅkarācāryar.

The third edition is Rājam 1956, comprising the whole Tivyappirapantam and corresponding to the general Rājam model of text only with sandhi simplification, no variants and European punctuation marks, presenting what perhaps may be counted as the standard secular text of the Vaiṣṇava Tamil canon.

Number four is another Śrīvaiṣṇava text, Ti. Virarākavācāryaṅ 1956-58, in brochure format for the single Antāti-s, this one the first to have a few variants in brackets, accompanied by a new tabular paraphrase and the editor’s commentary entitled “protection of the Prapantam” (prapantarakṣa).

Finally, I have made use of the 2006 Śrīvaiṣṇavaśrī pocket edition by A. Kīruṣṇamācāryar, with text only, European punctuation and variants noted below the text.

No Vaiṣṇava edition that has come to my notice so far displays full adherence to the rules of presentation that had been developed for the early prints of classical Tamil poetry. Many, especially of the older ones, do not consistently split metrical feet, all tamper with sandhi in an arbitrary manner, and none describe manuscripts or discuss in any way the fact that the text had to be constituted. All appear to proceed from the assumption that they are publishing a well-established canonical text used for daily recitation, and it is not before the middle of the last century that at least some rudimentary variants – without mention of sources, but presumably between printed edition – are added.

As for the exegetical tradition, there are two traditional Vaiṣṇava commentaries for the Antāti-s, namely, as already mentioned, Periyavāccāṅ Pillai's Vyākhyānam and another, earlier one by Nañciyār which I have not yet managed to locate in print. These works are theological, not literary commentaries, containing no paraphrase and composed in a highly sanskritised Maṇipravāḷam.¹³ Paraphrases appear to begin with the printed editions and were at some point brought into a synoptic tabular form, easy to consult.

1.4.2 Manuscripts and the Current Edition

For the time being, it is impossible to say how many manuscripts might still be around for the Tivyappirapantam. Actually, the EFEO collection alone, with more than three hundred sixty mss. for the whole corpus, contains eighteen mss. of the Iyarpā, the part of the third thousand that begins with Poykai Ālvār's Mutal Tiruvantāti. All of them are on palm-leaf and in surprisingly good condition. The ones consulted for the current edition are those with a continuous root text: six of eighteen come with the Vyākhyānam, twelve come with mūlam only. The ones that are reported are two exceptionally well-written ones, F3 and F8, on which more is given below (for the full list, cf. bibliography). One has to keep in mind, however, that this chance selection may not be representative for the full range of transmission, since all of these manuscripts come from a single collection, made in one single region, namely Ālvārtirunakari.

The fundamental problem with the vast majority of these sources is that they are devout manuscripts, on the one hand abounding in obvious copying mistakes, on the other hand incorporating local spelling variants and Maṇipravāḷa-like oral forms (such as cātti for cārri). In the manuscripts, sandhi is mostly classical and more consistently employed than in the editions, although there are a couple of exceptions where the rules are not necessarily followed strictly. The most important ones are:

final -m (especially with -um) may not be elided before nasal (ஒன்றும் மறந்து instead of ஒன்று மறந்து Po. 6.1);

final -n before n- may not assimilate into n but keeps two consonants nn (அறிலிலேன் | நீ instead of அறிலிலே | னீ Po. 3.3f.);

final -l/-ḷ before nasal may not change into the corresponding nasal (நூல் மறை instead of நூன் மறை Po. 5.2);

final -l before plosive may not change into r but be kept, and the plosive is geminated (சூருருவில்ப | பேயளவு instead of சூருருவிற் | பேயளவு Po. 3.2f.);¹⁴

final -l before t- may not change into -(r)ṛ- (வாசல் தானே instead of வாச(ற்) றானே Po. 4.1).

Under such circumstances, it is not easy to decide what would be the task and the purpose of a critical edition. Presumably it would be desirable to have a three-layered apparatus, one with actual (semantic and morpho-syntactical) variants, one with dialectal or spelling variants and one with sandhi variants. The current edition constitutes but a modest step in that direction in that it is based on the verification of the variants found between five printed editions and two useful manuscripts. As such its apparatus neither includes mere sandhi and spelling variants nor obvious mistakes. The majority of variants concern dialectal variation such as mārpu/mārvu, and pronominal and verbal forms in singular/plural: frequently the manuscripts read a plural form for the god, which is against general expectation and partly expurgated in the editions, though by no means consistently. The manuscripts F3 and F8, the latter dated to Kollam 911 (~ 1736 CE), have been chosen on the basis of their being comparatively free from obvious errors and their predominant adherence to classical sandhi.

Refuge [be] the holy feet of Periyānampiyal, refuge the holy feet of Aṅiraṅkatta Mutāṅār!”

¹⁵ Read koḷantu as a spoken counterpart of koṅṅu?

The current edition begins with the taniyan for each Antāti. After that, the layout accommodates one verse per page, beginning with the verse number within the text, followed by a number in brackets for the count of verses in the Tivyappirapantam (according to the numbering found in the Rājam edition). Then follows the Tamil text with full classical sandhi and metrical split, an apparatus, a word-split transliteration and an English translation. Text-critical problems are discussed in notes to the apparatus, semantic and morphological problems are discussed in notes to the transliteration, problems of syntax, poetics and content are discussed in notes to the translation. The morphological analysis and semantic interpretation of each item, as well as its distribution and frequency, are found in the glossary-cum-concordance added after the epilogue.

The Tamil text follows the old edition by Tarkkatīrttar Rāmānujācāryar and Si. Muttukruṣṇanāyūṭu 1901, but employs manuscript sandhi, which is, as already noted, more faithful to classical sandhi, with the simple aim of avoiding the arbitrary inconsistency typical of all the current editions. The apparatus notes valid variants between the five editions enumerated under 1.4.1 and the two selected manuscripts F3 and F8. The goal is, firstly, to have a source for variants that goes beyond the modern editions, which do not name sources at all, and, secondly, to have at least a first inkling about the majorities for variants. Currently there are variants for about one third of the stanzas. The result suggests that the main goal of the early editions was to produce a unified text partly purified from the influence of oral transmission and not to document the breadth of the transmitted evidence. The possibility may not be discounted that the first editions were based on a selection of “best” local manuscripts and that very soon after re-editions were made on the basis of already existing print versions, as was the case with other classical Tamil texts. It would be definitely worthwhile to make an attempt at a more thorough examination of surviving testimonies, taking into account at the very least a selection of “best” local manuscripts from the various regions of the country.

I.4.3 The Translation

The one complete English translation known to me is by Śrī Irāmaparati, found incorporated, after a modern Tamil prose commentary, into S. Jekatrācakan’s edition of 2002, entitled Nālāyira Tivyap Pirapantam. The Sacred Book of Four Thousand. It renders the gist of a stanza from a believer’s point of view, while often omitting details and sometimes whole lines. The translation presented in this volume strives to be as literal as possible, keeping in mind the syntactical habits, poetic conventions and lexicon of the period the poems were composed in (that is, the late 6th to early 7th c.) and not those of an established Śrīvaiṣṇava school, as is represented by the theological commentary of Periyavāccāṅ Piḷḷai (13th c.).

I.5 Grammar and Lexicon

I.5.1 Morphology (Innovations and Peculiarities)

From the point of view of morphology, the Antāti-s stand half-way between the Caṅkam corpus (minus the two later anthologies of Kalittokai and Paripāṭal which were integrated later and appear to represent the same phase of mixed forms) and the bulk of the bhakti works (Vaiṣṇava and Śaiva).¹⁶ In short, the most important innovations are, for nouns, the introduction of the plural form in -kaḷ; for pronouns, the parallel occurrence of old and new pronouns for the 1st and 2nd person singular (yān/nāṇ, niṇ/un); for verbs, multiple transitional forms for the conditional/concessive, the infiltration of new imperative and negative forms, the introduction of the causative and the present tense. The following tables show the new and transitional forms in the three texts, along with a number of rarer occurrences of other phenomena. The peculiarities of the rarer forms are discussed in the footnotes to the translation.

On the level of nominal forms, the plural form in -kaḷ has already taken quite some ground but is by no means ubiquitous; it is still predominantly restricted to neuter forms. One form with ninru as a postposition in ablative function is found, as is occasionally seen from this time onwards. Adverbs in -āy also begin to occur; the Antāti-s show two examples. The agent noun based on a verbal root plus -i is prevalent for example in the Śaiva Tevāram but also appears here just once. The two forms karru and pērkkal simply are rarer types of adjective and verbal noun and not diagnostic of the period.

For the pronouns, in the first and second person singular, the old forms are still in the majority but the new ones are clearly on the way. The adjectival form of the deictic, however, is represented with a single inta for i-.

As far as the verb forms are concerned, the present tense is still marginal, and with muyalkirpārkkū there is what is presumably a hybrid of the old auxiliary construction with kil-tal, “to be able to” and the modern tense form. One isolated instance of the intermittent continuous form consisting in an absolutive in -ā plus a form of nil-tal, to stand”, can be located. The new causative extension -vitt-/vikk- is attested for absolutive and peyareccam/habitual future. For the negatives, there is the new absolutive in -āmal and the negative finite form based on the perfective stem plus the negative verb il instead of al, both new. For the imperatives, we find a first example of the old imperative plural/honorific suffix -miṅ extended by a modern plural -kaḷ. The frequent bhakti imperatives of perfective stem plus second person plural (which by morphological analysis should be simple perfective forms) are represented by the single form kaṇṭīr, but in multiple occurrences. Two examples are found for the intermittent negative imperative of verbal root plus -ēl.

But the most surprising and variable form is the conditional/concessive. It is in this area that the innovations are most advanced, while it has to be kept in mind that most of these forms did not survive and the field was gradually taken over by the modern absolutive plus -āl/-ālum. In fact there are only four occurrence of the simple conservative forms in -iṅ (collin, “if speaking” Pū. 63.4, āyiṅum, “even if being” Po. 41.3 Pū. 58.3, ceyiṅum, “even if doing” Po. 41.1). The forms in -ēl/-ēlum are well-attested, most of them on a finite verb – a type found neither before nor much after – and one case does the same with -āl. Even more frequent is verbal root plus -il/-ilum. About one quarter of the attested forms, however, already make use of the absolutive, one with -ēl added, and all the rest with -āl/-ālum. Another rare intermittent form attested once is a conditional/concessive suffix added to a noun, here with ēṅum, regarded as a contraction of eṅiṅum.

All in all, the evidence suggests that, after the comparative stability of Classical Tamil as a medium for the Caṅkam works, poetry has entered into a phase of experimentation, as is confirmed also on the level of metre and poetics. The reason repeated all over in most publications on Tamil bhakti is that this kind of devotional text would be simpler and closer to the spoken idiom(s) of the day. The early Antāti-s do little to confirm such a hypothesis. As has been shown, morphology is in part even more complicated, and certainly more fluid, than in the earlier literary layers, and while simple constructions do occur – and four-line poems by nature tend to be more straightforward than the longer forms – many are not so easy to understand, especially if one tries to grasp the details. It is possible that part of the changes are due to a shift in the social milieu of the poets, going hand in hand with a shift of regional concentration from the very South (Madurai and the Pāṇṭiya court) to the North and the Cōḷa heart land.

I.5.2. Vocabulary (Old, New, Sanskrit)

The vocabulary is not simplified in comparison to the older works; it is rich and varied, full of synonyms and homophons.¹⁷ This topic will be taken up again below under the etukai rhyme form and its requirements. Here we shall deal summarily with a few shifts in meaning and type of construction. Semantic shifts are of course not surprising with texts from a different genre and milieu, and my point at the moment is not to draw any historical conclusion, but to point out a few such changes that deserve to be examined in more detail. As far as nouns are concerned, the most momentous development is the augmentation of the Sanskrit share in the lexicon, which will be dealt with in the next section. One peculiarity to be mentioned here is the shift of meaning in the common noun mey. While in the Caṅkam corpus mey almost always means “body” and only occasionally refers to “truth”, in the Antāti-s there are a number of new words for the body (see below under 1.5.2.2) and mey always means “truth”, while the old word for “truth”, namely vāy, occurs but one single time.

A number of important verbs undergo a process of re-interpretation, and in some cases, we may observe the process of transition. An important verb of Tamil religious vocabulary is the verb turattal, “to give up”, used both in the Śaiva and the Vaiṣṇava bhakti corpus with the strongly devout connotation of abandoning worldly ties. This, however, was not the meaning predominant in older Akam poetry where turattal is frequent as one of several verbs denoting that the hero leaves his beloved in order to go on what would nowadays be called a business trip. The main difference is that in the older text turattal refers to a temporary absence, while its devotional meaning is to give up something once and for good, to renounce. In the Antāti-s this is not a frequent verb, but it may not be chance that it occurs in two places that are excellent illustrations of both the old and the new meaning. In Po. 40.2 an elephant bull on the rampage in the millet field is frightened by the fire of the guardians and leaves the field: veruvi+ puṇam turanta vēlam. In Pū. 42.3f., however, we find that the worshippers of the lord have renounced on all worldly pleasures: inpam ellām | turantār.

Another interesting case is that of the verb aruḷutal, “to be gracious”, ubiquitous as benefactive auxiliary following an absolutive (“graciously doing x”) all over the bhakti works, occasionally already found before in connection with kings of gracious behaviour. This benefactive function with absolutive is not at all found in the Antāti-s; the verb is only seen thrice as a simple main verb in the sense of “to be gracious” (Pū. 55.4, 57.1; Pē. 19.1).

Noticeable also is the frequent verb olītal, in the older corpus mostly a main verb meaning “to stay behind”, rarely already “to stop”. This older meaning can be observed in two places. In Po. 55.2 where the servants of the lord are left behind (olīvatu) by Yama’s people (who are apparently out harvesting souls). In Pū. 55.2, the poet is speaking in the first person about his own “nature that does not stop thinking constantly all the time of the seven births” (ēl pirappum eppolutum | ninru ninaipp’ oliyā nīrmai). In the majority of cases, however, olītal is used as an auxiliary with the absolutive, retaining in that function both the old connotation of staying, that is, going on to and of stopping to do something. The former is attested in Pē. 19.1, asking about the lord whether he would “remain without bestowing grace” (aruḷāt’ oliyumē), and Po. 51.2, where the lord’s feet “remain fully clear” (teḷint’-oliyum cevvē) to the mind of the devotee. The latter is found in Po. 59.2, where the devotee to be is told what to do “if he wants to stop from returning” (māṇṭ’ oliya vēṇṭil) to the evils of this world, and Po. 75.2, where, upon considering the lord, the devotee’s bonds open once and for all (aviḷnt’ oliyum).

These few examples should suffice to demonstrate the utility (and necessity) of detailed semantic and syntactic analysis, an area of research still largely uncovered in Tamil studies.

1.5.2.1 The Sanskrit Share

The most considerable change is the far higher share of Sanskrit vocabulary: the glossary contains 189 lemmas for Sanskrit/Prakrit words, some of them with a considerable number of derivations and multiple occurrences (the full list follows after the glossary). Only about 30 of these are Caṅkam borrowings, the vast majority are new ones. While already the Caṅkam borrowings quite clearly presuppose a literary substratum far beyond loans of convenience,¹⁸ the new words suggest the influence of Sanskrit narrative mythology (such as the Mahābhārata), but also some knowledge of pūjā ritual and theology.

Overwhelming is the Sanskrit share in proper nouns, that is, names for mythic personages like deities and demons, but also toponyms; there are virtually no Tamil counterparts except for a few designations of Viṣṇu such as (Tiru)māl:¹⁹

ayan < Skt. aja-, p.n. “the unborn one ~ Brahmā”

aran < Skt. hara-, p.n. “Hara”

aṇantaṇ < Skt. ananta-, p.n. of the snake

iraṇiyaṇ < Skt. hiraṇya-, p.n. m.sg. “Hiraṇya” irāmaṇ < Skt. rāma-, p.n. m.sg. “Rāma” irāvaṇaṇ < Skt. rāvaṇa-, p.n. m.sg. “Rāvaṇa” uvaṇam < Skt. suparṇa-?, p.n. “Suparṇa” kaṅkai < Skt. gaṅgā-, p.n. “Ganges” kañcaṇ < Skt. kaṁsa-, p.n. m.sg. “Kaṁsa” kaṇṇaṇ < Pkt. kaṇha-, p.n. m.sg. “Kṛṣṇa” karuṭaṇ < Skt. garuḍa-, p.n. m.sg. “Garuḍa”

¹⁸ Groups of words like tēvam, acurar, amarar, amutam show a familiarity with religious narratives, while kāmam, “passion”, and nūl, the calque on Skt. sūtra-, “treatise” suggest the reception of both kāvya and theoretical literature; examples could easily be multiplied. Some words seem to be reborrowed: in addition to the older-stratum avuṇar (without clear derivation but usually understood as “Asura”), the Antāti-s also know the unambiguous form acurar (< Skt. asura-).

¹⁹ A few nouns, especially names, appear in long and short forms, such as nāraṇaṇ/nārāyaṇaṇ, vāmaṇ/vāmaṇaṇ, kañcaṇai/kañcai(acc.).

kēcavaṅ < Skt. keśava-, n.p. m.sg. “Kēśava” cītai < Skt. sītā-, p.n. “Sītā” tiru < Skt. śrī-, p.n. “Śrī” namaṅ < Skt. yama-, p.n. m.sg. “Yama” nāraṇaṅ/nārāyaṇaṅ < Skt. nārāyaṇa-, p.n. m.sg. “Nārāyaṇa” pāratam < Skt. bhārata-, p.n. “Bhārata” matukaiṭavar < Skt. madhu-kaiṭabha-, p.n. h. “Madhu and Kaiṭabha” mātavaṅ < Skt. mādava-, p.n. m.sg. “Mādhava” māvali < Skt. mahābali-, p.n. “Mahābali” muraṅ < Skt. mura-, p.n. n.sg. of an Asura killed by Viṣṇu yātavaṅ < Skt. yādava-, p.n. m.sg. “Yādava” vakkaraṅ < Skt. vakra-, p.n. m.sg. of an Asura slain by Viṣṇu vācuki < Skt. vāsuki-, p.n. of a snake vāṇaṅ < Skt. bāṇa-, p.n. m.sg. of an Asura

toponyms:

(tiru-v-)araṅkam < śrīraṅgam, p.n. “Srirangam” ilaṅkāpuram < Skt. laṅkāpuram, p.n. “the city of Laṅkā” ilaṅkai < Skt. laṅkā-, p.n. “Laṅkā” mantaram < Skt. mandara-, p.n. of a mountain
vaikuntam < Skt. vaikuṅṭha-, p.n. for Viṣṇu’s heaven

However, it has to be stated that we are dealing for the most part only with nouns, While in the later bhakti corpus verbs also begin to be transferred freely, in the Antāti-s only five are attested, none of them very frequent:

cinti < Skt. cint-, v. 11. “to think” piramāṇi < Skt. pramāṇa- (n.!), v. 11. “to estimate, to put faith in” pūri < Skt. pṛ-, v. 11. “to fill”

mati < Skt. mati- (n.!), v. 11. “to estimate, to regard”

vanti < Skt. vand-, v. 11. “to laud”

Even rarer are numerals, for which there are only two examples:

aṭṭa < Skt. aṣṭa-, num. “eight”

pāraci < Pkt. bārasī-, num. “twelveth”

Also Sanskrit compounds occur, although many of them already seem to have been lexicalised in the possible Sanskrit source texts (such as pañkaja-, literally “mud-born” for “lotus”):

kōpālakan, < Skt. gopālaka- n. m.sg. “cowherd” Pē. 32.4

kōvalan, < Skt. gopāla- n. m.sg. “cowherd” Pū. 98.3 Pē. 42.1

ciṅkācaṇam, < Skt. siṃhāsana- n. “lion throne” Po. 53.1

cilātalattin, obl. of cilātalam < Skt. śilāsthala- n. “rock” Pē. 58.1

curācurarkaḷ, < Skt. surāsura- “gods and Asuras” Po. 48.2

tīrttakarar, < Skt. tīrthakara- n. 3.h. “those who purify themselves” Pū. 14.4

tēvātītēvan, < Skt. devādideva- n. “god of gods” Pū. 28.3

tēvācurar, < Skt. devāsura- n. “gods and Asuras” Pē. 48.4

nicācarar, < Skt. niśācara- n. “nightwanderers” Po. 83.3

pañkayam, < Skt. pañkaja- n. “lotus” Pē. 55.3

puyakarattān, pron.n. m.sg. of compound < Skt. bhujakara- n. “arms and hands” Pē. 99.2

matukaiṭavar, < Skt. madhu-kaiṭabha- p.n. “Madhu and Kaiṭabha”
Pē. 66.3

Calques, such as nūl for sūtra and kēḷvi for śruti, are numerous, and often the two words are used side by side, as in the case of karumam and viṇai. One of them, however, deserves special mentions because we cannot exclude the possibility that it refers to more than its lexical Sanskrit counterpart, that is, to the title of a text. The Tamil āyiram pēr (Pū. 73.1),²⁰ “a thousand names” clearly goes back to Skt. sahasra-nāma, which brings to mind the Viṣṇusahasranāma, a stotra text lauding the god by the enumeration of his names (and epithets), transmitted, for example, in the wake of the Mahābhārata. This kind of worship is evoked several times in the Antāti-s, with many references based on another word pair, namely Tamil peyar or pēr and Skt. nāman. Such an interpretation is supported by the fact that there are two attestations (Po. 57.3, 95.1) of an invocation formula, the only case where a Sanskrit case ending is taken over into the Tamil text, namely namō nāraṇā. Note, however, that the Skt. case is kept only for the first member; in the name of the deity the expected Skt. dative (nārāyaṇāya) is substituted by a Tamil vocative.

Last but not least, the influence of Sanskrit can be found on the level of syntax, namely in the form of relative clauses, emulated, in Tamil, in default of an actual relative pronoun, with the help of an interrogative pronoun and a deictic. The two Antāti examples are Po. 44²¹ and Pē. 21.1.²²

²⁰ See also pēr īr ai nūru, “names twice five hundred” in Pū. 77.3.

²¹ tamar ukantat’ evvuruvam avvuruvam tāṇē,
tamar ukantat’ eppēr marr’ appēr, – tamar ukant’

²² pēcuvār evvaḷavu pēcuvār avvaḷavē, “To the extent that they talk, they will talk.”

*I.5.2.2 Semantics of Worship*²³

The bhakti semantics of worship and devotion [Hardy: 288-293] appears to be fully installed already in the Antāti-s, with the exception already mentioned, that is, the absence of benefactive auxiliary aruḷ-tal. Remarkable, from the point of view of the lexicon, is the sheer number of words that refer to body,²⁴ heart and/or mind or soul,²⁵ none of them studied for their precise range of implications and associations. The basic emotive universe is simple. The god feels aruḷ for his creation and for his devotees, usually translated with “grace”, which is slightly infelicitous because the concept of grace implies a total liberty of god to grant or to withhold it. The Tamil word aruḷ, however, is taken over from Akam poetry, where it denotes the feeling of consideration and considerate behaviour on the part of a man that is due to a consort who is beloved and moreover the weaker part. Similarly, god’s aruḷ contains an element of obligation, which is also expressed in the second frequent verb besides aruḷutal, namely aḷittal, “to care and to provide for”.

The complimentary feeling of the devotee is aṇṇu, “love” or ārvam, warm “affection”, only rarely kātal, traditionally used to denote love between the sexes. The desired situation is one of aṭimai, “servantship”, also expressed in a pronominal noun formation aṭiyēṇ, “I the servant”, ²³ Figures and distribution of the vocabulary discussed here can be found in the glossary.

²⁴ I.e., the Tamil words ākam, uṭampu, uṭal, paṭi, mēni, yākkai plus the Sanskrit loans āṅkam, kāyam; the older word mey, as already mentioned, is used exclusively in the sense of “truth”.

²⁵ I.e., the Tamil words akam, āvi, uḷ(lam), neṅcu/neṅcam. Perhaps because theological vocabulary is mostly taken over from Sanskrit, here the Northern share is especially high with itaiyam (for Skt. hṛdaya-), cintam/cintai, punti (for Skt. buddhi-), mati, maṇam, the latter two old loans.

or with the simple noun āl, “man”; the second important designation of toṅṅar, often translated as “slave”, is not yet found in the Antāti-s. The corresponding verb is āṭpaṭutal/ttal, “to become/to be made a servant”. The sense of unworthiness is based on the notion of karma, most often evoked by the Tamil calque viṅai and the pronominal noun derivation viṅaiyēn, “I who have (bad) karma”. The later self-denigration of being a dog, nāy, is not yet present.

The concrete actions of worship correspond to a normal pūjā: singing, strewing flowers, adorning with flowers (mostly the feet), pouring water, bringing incense, bowing and prostrating. The internal counterparts are meditating, concentrating and visualising. The general verbs of worship are toḷutal, paravutal, pēṅutal; the verb kūpputal refers to the añjali gesture, as does kai-toḷutal. Of the three verbs of physical reverence two refer to simple bowing (iraiñcutal, vaṅaṅkūtal), while paṅital means the more complete act of prostration at the feet of the lord. Five verbs denote verbal praise, namely ēttutal, ōtutal, pukaḷtal, vāḷttal, and the Sanskrit derivate vantittal. The act of singing is only rarely mentioned: the verb pāṭutal, connected with what is done with the majority of the Vaiṣṇava bhakti corpus (composed in icai-tamiḷ, “musical Tamil”), occurs only seven times.

Also, the prospective goals are simple, namely getting rid of pain or affliction, escaping the effect of karma (aruṅi/val viṅai), joining the feet of the lord, and seeing heaven.

I.6 Poetic Conventions

I.6.1 Metre: Veṅpā + Etukai

The most obvious innovation the Antāti-s share with the bulk of the Kīlkkāṅakku is the metre, Veṅpā, in four-line stanzas, while the large majority of the Tamil bhakti works share the variability of metre after the metrical revolution. The change is fundamental, since, firstly, the way of counting metrical feet has changed – nērpu and niraipu have been abolished except for the very last foot in a stanza. Secondly, metrical feet with three acai have become part of the normal line pattern instead of being a rare exception. This has consequences for the older formulaic repertoire that in part cannot function anymore, because the metrical conditions have changed.²⁶ The basic pattern chosen is the Nēricai Veṅṅā, with the first rhyme (etukai) in foot 1a, 2a and 2d and the second rhyme in 3a and 4a. This type of rhyme influences semantics because poets often extend the rhyming portion beyond the second syllable of the foot which is the metrical requirement. That is why often we see a triple repetition of a full foot in line 1a, 2a and 2d, either with clever ways of multiple word split or with a simple repetition of a single word or phrase, with or without the exploitation of homophony. This triple repetition can be counted as one of the syntactical patterns to be discussed below in section 6.2.

It is, however, not so easy to achieve this form of triplication (or, for the feet 3a and 4a, duplication), and that explains another interesting feature of etukai, namely the poetic license given to the poet to make phonetic modifications to rhyme elements. The following list contains all the instances of such changes found in the three Antāti-s. Another option frequently made use of is a change of word order, as seen for example in Pū. 69.2f. cem kamalam pū mēvum into pū mēvum | cem kamalam.

1.6.2 Syntactical Patterns

Many syntactic patterns continue, in spite of the metrical innovation; the most prominent of them is the pūṭṭuvil, “the drawn bow”, where the prose word order can be restored by connecting the end of the poem back to the beginning. This is marked in the transcript text, which contains punctuation marks, by an infinity sign ∞ instead of a full stop. This prolific device continues to be used for more than one fifth of the stanzas, namely sixty-two of them.²⁷ One of the rarer subtypes of the old corpus, the post-positioned absolutive, becomes much more frequent, for the simple reason that in Veṅpā the last foot consists of a single acai that can also take the form of pirappu and kācu – the typical absolutive (e.g., Pū. 47.4 uṅarntu, Po. 78.4 koṅṭu). But also postposition of subject or object remain current, such as in Po. 9 or Po. 22:

poruk kōṭṭi' ōr ēnam āyp pukk' iṭantāykk' anr' un oru kōṭṭin mēl kiṭantat' anrē – viri tōṭṭa
cē aṭiyai nīṭṭit ticai naṭuṅka viṅ tulaṅka
mā vaṭivīn nī aḷanta maṅ[∞]

That day she rested on one of your tusks, isn't it, of you who entered as a boar with fighting-tusks [and] rooted [it] up, the earth which you measured in huge form, extending your feet, red [like] broad-leaved [lotuses], so that the directions trembled, the sky swayed?

ariyum ulak' ellām yānēyum allē,

All the world knows, not only me,
 o you who mounted Suparṇa with spotted wings,
 – about the scars [obtained] when [she with] bamboo-like soft shoulders scented with perfume tied you, who had eaten the churned butter, with a rope.

What used to be a formulaic pattern based on the repetition of the particle *-ē*²⁸ becomes a subtype of triple etukai repetition in Nēricai-

²⁸ See, for example, Kuruntokai 97.1f., inimitable in a translation: yānē iṅṭai yēnē enṅalaṅē | āṅā nōyoṭu kaṅal aḱṭē, “I, I am here; my goodness, ah, | is with unending pain in the seashore grove.”

venṅpā, with fifteen examples just in the Antāti-s,²⁹ as for example in Pū. 66:

itu kaṅṭāy nal neñcē ippiravi āvatu.
itu kaṅṭāy ellām nām urratu – itu kaṅṭāy nāraṇaṅ pēr ōti narakatt' aruk' aṅaiyāk kāraṇamum. vallaiyēl kāṅ.

See this, good heart, this birth's happening.
 See this, all that we've undergone. See this, as a reason not to come close to hell, reciting the names of Nāraṇaṅ.
 If you have the strength, look.

Another innovation momentous for the whole of bhakti literature is the implication of the devotees, presumably the co-temple visitors and audience of the performing poet-saint, in the form of imperatives and direct vocative addresses. As a form this continues the speaker's address to his own heart, the famous inner monologues of Caṅkam literature, as can be seen also in the verse quoted above. A new type of example is found in Pū. 91:

²⁹ Cf. Po. 23, 68; Pū. 65, 66, 67, 68, 70, 74, 77, 83; Pē. 1, 6, 38, 48, 51, but also Arputat Tiruvantāti 5, 7, 9, 11, 12, 14, 21, 24, 30, 45, 88, 93. The last of these, AT 93 is incidentally based on exactly the same rhyme word:

avaṅ kaṅṭāy vāṅōr pirāṅ āvāṅ eṅrum.
avaṅ kaṅṭāy am pavaḷa vaṅṅaṅ. – avaṅ kaṅṭāy who measured all of these worlds surrounded by the rain[-filled] ocean, before him who took the measure of many treatises.

I.6.3 Poetic Forms

The poetic forms and techniques show influence from both the Akam and the Puṛam traditions [Cutler 1987, Wilden 2013: 98-116], but the Antāti-s are especially interesting because they were a field of experimenting with older material, and some of their attempts were not followed up in the later Tivyappirapantam corpus. As far as Puṛam is concerned, the main elements to be taken over are the protagonists and their relationship, that is, god is described as a king, while the devotee is playing the role of the subject, and the poet is a poet and one of the subjects. The king's or god's physical beauty and prowess are part of his power, and the subject-devotee is his submissive servant and admirer. The imitation goes down to specific images, such as the trope of the king's feet that are scarred because the other kings whom he subdued bow onto them with their crowns – found in Pē. 96 as:

vālṭṭiya vāyar āy vāṅōr maṅi maḷuṭam
tālṭṭi vaṇaṅkat talump' amē – kēḷṭta aṭit tāmarai malar-mēl maṅkai maṅāḷaṅ
aṭit tāmarai am alar[∞]

Because the celestials, as those whose mouths praise [him], lower [their] jewelled crowns [and] bow [to them], they are scarred, – the blossoms that are the lotus feet of the husband of the girl on the lotus blossom with a lustrous stalk.

The main influence of Akam at this early stage lies in the description of sensual beauty, keeping many of the epithets of female beauty intact, such as the eyes that are dangerous swords to the one looking into them (Po. 82 vāḷ kaṇṇār).³⁰ More pronounced, however, is the emphasis on male beauty, thus implicitly making the god an object of adoration with an erotic under-current, even while the framework of depicting the poet in the persona of a girl in love has not yet been developed, as in Pē. 9:

*kaṇṇum kamalam, kamalamē kait talamum, maṇ aḷanta pātamum marr' avaiyē. – eṇ il
 karu mā mukil vaṇṇaṇ, kārkaḷ kaṭal nīr vaṇṇaṇ, tīru mā maṇi vaṇṇaṇ tēcu.*

The eyes lotuses, and only lotuses, the palms of [his] hands, and [his] feet that measured the earth again are such. – Immeasurable light [is] he, the colour of big black clouds, he the colour of the rain ocean's water, he the colour of brilliant dark sapphire.

A couple of rhetoric devices are used with some frequency, some of them tallying with what would be called figures of speech in the European or alaṅkāra in the Sanskrit traditions, some others better loosely designated as poetic types. One of the frequent forms employed is an ³⁰ For the full-fledged adaptation of Akam scenery in Nammālvār's Tiruvāymoli, see Wilden 2014.

enumeration, be it of attributes, of divine exploits or of cosmic counterpart, as seen in Po. 12:

*cevi vāy kaṇ mūkk' uṭal enr' aiṁ pulanum, cem tī
puvi kāl nīr viṇ pūtam aintum, – aviyāta ñānamum vēḷiyum nal aramum enparē, ēnam āy niṅrārḱ' iyalvu.*

The five sense organs, namely ear, mouth, eye, nose, body, the five elements, [namely] red fire, earth, wind, water, sky, unending knowledge, sacrifice and good Dharma, they say, are the nature of him who stood as a boar.

An intriguing special type of the same technique is what might be called a protracted chiasm, or, in Sanskrit, a yathāsamkhyā. An example of this form is Po. 54 (with only one parallel in Pē. 60):

*¹aravam aṭal ²vēlam ³āṅ ⁴kuruntam ⁵puḷ vāy
⁶kuravai ⁷kuṭam ⁸mulai mal ⁹kuṅram – karav' iṅri
¹viṭṭ' ²iṅuttu ³mēytt' ⁴ocittuk ⁵kīṅṭu ⁶kōṭṭ' āṭi ⁷uṅṭ' ⁸aṭṭ' ⁹eṭutta cem kaṇ +avaṅ.*

The one who, without hiding, sent the snake, broke the murderous bull elephant, grazed the cows, broke the wild lime tree, tore the bird's beak, linked [hands] in the Kuravai dance, danced with the pots, drank from the breast [and] killed [the demoness], lifted the mighty hill, is him with red eyes.

Another type is the simple juxtaposition of contrasting elements, either in the shape of a lengthy nominal clause or marked on the content level by a pairing for opposites such as easy-difficult.³¹ A beautiful

³¹ See, for example, Po. 50 and compare with AT 19:

Po. 50 *ariya pulan aint' aṭakki āy malar koṅṭ' ārvam
puriyap paricināl pulkil – periyāṅ āy* example of the former type is found in Po. 5, the first introduction of the Hari-Hara theme in the Antāti-s:

aran nāraṇaṇ nāmam āṇ viṭai puḷ ūrti
urai nūl marai uraiyum kōyil – varai nīr karumam alipp’ alippuk kaiyatu vēl nēmi uruvam eri kār mēṇi onru.

Hara [and] Nāraṇa – the names, bull [and] bird – the mounts, the words – Sūtra [and] Veda, the temple they live in – mountain [and] water,
 the deeds – destruction [and] care, in [their] hands – spear [and] discus,
 the forms – flame [and] cloud, [but their] body – one.

mārrātu vīrrirunta māvali-pāl vaḷ kai nīr
ērrāṇaik kāṇpat’ elitu.

If one embraces [him] by means of practising devotion with choice flowers, repressing the five senses difficult [to control], it is easy to see the one who received in [his] generous hand water from Māvali who unchangeably sat enthroned as a great man.

AT 19 inru namakk’ elitē mālukkuṁ nānmukarkuṁ
anrum alapp’ ariyaṇ āṇānai - enrum or mūvā matiyāṇai mū ēl ulakaṅkaḷ
āvāṇaik kāṇuṁ arivu[∞]

Today it is easy for us – the knowledge that sees him who had become difficult to measure that day for Māl and the four-faced one,
 the one always with an unaging moon,
 the one who is the thrice seven worlds.

Simpler and much more frequent are rhetorical questions usually expressing suitable amazement and admiration for the divine exploits, such as in Po. 92:

*vān ākit tī āy mari kaṭal āy mārutam āy
tēn ākip pāl ām tirumālē – ān āycci veṇṇey viḷuika niraiyumē muṇ oru nāl maṇṇai umiḷnta vayiru?*

O Tirumāl who is sky, fire, churning sea, wind, honey [and] milk, when you swallow the butter
of the cowherdess, will it be full, [that] belly that,
on a former day, spit out the earth?

Also, allegories can be found, a figure already well-established and frequently employed, for example, in Puraṇānūru war imagery where the king is depicted as a farmer who reaps body-crops on the battle field [cf. PN 369; Wilden 2006]. The best known and foremost of the bhakti examples is the very first verse of the first Antāti, Po. 1, with clear intextual repercussions in Pū. 1:

*vaiyam takaḷi ā, vār kaṭalē ney āka, veyya katirōṇ viḷakk' ākac – ceyya
cuṭar āliyāṇ aṭikkē cūṭṭiṇēṇ col mālai iṭar āli nīnkukavē eṇru.*

With the earth as bowl, the overflowing sea as oil, the [sun] with hot rays as lamp, I put [this] word garland on the feet of him with the red-glowing discus, saying, 'may I leave the ocean of affliction.'

aṇpē takaḷi ā ārvamē ney āka iṇp' uruku cintai ~iṭu tiri ā – naṇp' uruki

ñānac cuṭar viḷakk' ērrinēn nāraṇarku ñānat tamil purinta nāṇ.

Love as bowl, devotion as oil,
the mind melting with bliss as a wick to be put, well melting,
I lifted the glowing lamp of cognition,
I who made expert Tamil for Nāraṇaṇ.

Rather more frequent in the Śaiva corpus but also found here is a type of poem that expresses praise by blame, a nindāstuti in Sanskrit, such as in Pū. 15:³²

tirintatu vem camattut tēr kaṭavi ~anru pirintatu cītaiyai mān piṇ pōyp – purintatuvum kaṇ palli koḷḷa alakiyatē, nākattin taṇ palli koḷvāṇ taṇakku.

That he wandered, urging the chariot in hot battle, that day, that he separated from Sītā, going after the deer, and that he desired
to have a bed on the ground – is that [so] beautiful[ly done] by the one who has [his] cool bed on the snake?

³² Cf. Po. 22, 24; Pū. 19 and AT 57:

*nī ulakam ellām irappiṇum niṇ uṭaiya
tīya arav' oliyac cel kaṇṭāy – tūya maṭavaralār vantū pali iṭār aṅci viṭa aravam mēl āṭa mikku[∞]*

Even if you beg in the whole world, go, see, while leaving behind the evil snakes you possess, as pure women will not come [and] put offerings [before you] while poisonous snakes are much dancing on [you].

A subtype of poem rather specific to the Antāti-s is what I would term a “temple poem”, of which we may distinguish two varieties, with a total of no less than twenty-four occurrences. References to temples of course are one of the prerequisites of bhakti poetry, especially in the decadic texts where usually a full decade is dedicated to a particular place, and its name is repeated in every stanza. The classical model for this is the Ārruppaṭai, where a bard guides another bard on the way to a wealthy patron. In the bhakti context, the stipulated rhetorical context is that of a devotee on a pilgrimage talking to another devotee who might want to see the same temple. The first Antāti strategy is slightly different in that there is not a series of stanzas devoted to one place but one stanza devoted to several places, even to an enumeration of places favoured by the lord, thus implicitly or explicitly making them locations for the devotee to visit. Five holy sites are mentioned in Pū. 46:³³

payinrat’ araṅkam tirukkōṭṭi pal nāl payinratuvum vēṅkaṭamē pal nāl – payinrat’ aṅi tikaḷum cōlai ~aṅi nīrmalaiyē
maṅi tikaḷum vaḷ taṭa+ kai māl[∞]

He is resident in [Tiruv]araṅkam [and] Tirukkōṭṭi and since many days is he resident in Vēṅkaṭam, since many days he is resident in ornate glittering Cōlai [and] on the decorative Nīrmalai – Māl with liberal broad hands who glitters [like] a sapphire.

The second variety is exclusively concerned with Vēṅkaṭam, the holy mountain of Tirupati. These verses are grafted on an Akam syntactic pattern with a new structure for the main sentence, namely a simple nominal clause with vēṅkaṭam as the subject that is further described by a peyareccam clause. This descriptive clause as such is also found in the later temple decades, where it can be replaced, however, by a series of stock attributes. The subtype is represented only twice in the Antāti-s, and their peyareccam clause describes the ritual activities going on in the temple, as in Po. 37:³⁴

vakai aru nuṅ kēlvi vāyvārkaḷ nālum pukai viḷakkum pūm puṅalum ēntit – ticai ticaiyiṅ vētiyarkaḷ cenr’ iraiñcum vēṅkaṭamē veḷ caṅkam ūtiya vāy māl ukanta ūr.

Vēṅkaṭam, where Veda experts arrive from all directions [and] bow, offering lamps with incense and water with flowers daily, those who acquire the subtle aural teachings without division, is the place that delights Māl, with [his] mouth that blew the white conch.

Unique in the Antāti-s, however, is a peyareccam sub-clause containing an Akam type of landscape description that in the earlier corpus might have functioned as an inset. In the new context the descriptions seem devoid of a second level of meaning, making it a kind of pseudo-inset, as in Pē. 71:³⁵

kaḷiru mukil kutta+ kai ~eṭutt’ oḷi ~oḷiru marupp’ oci kai yāḷi – piḷiri viḷa+ konru ninr’ atirum vēṅkaṭamē mēl nāl kula+ kanru koṅṭ’ erintān kunru.

³⁴ Cf. Po. 26.

³⁵ Cf. Po. 38, 40, 82; Pu. 53, 75; Pē. 45, 58, 68, 71, 72, 89; a slightly different syntactic structure is found in Pē. 16, 70.

Vēnkaṭam,

where the bull elephant stands [and] trumpets after having, trunk raised so that it pierces the clouds, run at [and] killed the Yāli, so that it fell, roaring, [its] paw broken by the shining tusk, is the hill of him who on a former day threw the young calf.

There are a couple of further Akam adaptations, none of them with many examples. The first is the messenger poem, a type particularly successful in the later Akam as well as in the bhakti tradition. In the single Antāti example, Po. 19, the entity addressed is not actually sent on an errand but just hailed as a fellow devotee:³⁶ mālum karum kaṭalē, eṇ nōrrāy, vaiyakam uṇṭ' ālīṇ ilait tuyiṇra āliyān, – kōlak karu mēṇic cem kaṇ māl kaṇpaṭaiyuḷ, eṇrum tiru mēṇi nī tīṇṭap perru[∞]

O perturbed black ocean, what [penance] did you undergo?, – to have obtained [the right] to always touch [his] sacred body, during the sleep of Māl with a beautiful black body [and] red eyes, the one with the discus who, having eaten the world, sleeps on a banyan leaf.

Pē. 69 is an equally isolated instance of another Akam adaptation prominent in the Tiruvāymoli, in which the mother expresses her helplessness at being confronted with the changes in her daughter who has fallen in love with god:

verp' eṇru vēnkaṭam pāṭum; viyal tuḷāyk
karp' eṇru cūṭum karum kuḷal mēl, – mal poṇra

³⁶ For the antecedents of this particular poem, see footnote 27 in the translation.

nīṅṭa tōḷ māl kiṭanta nīḷ kaṭal nīr āṭuvāṅ pūṅṭa nāl ellām pukum.

She sings of Vēṅkaṭam as ‘mountain’; she wears copious tulusi as [a sign of] fidelity on [her] black curls; in order to bathe, she enters on all the days that come the long sea where Māl lay, [his] shoulder extended so that [the wrestlers] were destroyed in wrestling.

Occasionally we find stanzas where landscape and natural phenomena become a theatre that enact the physical appearance of the lord, just like a love-lorne girl in an Akam poem may see traces of her absent beloved in the trees, the hills, etc., as in Pē. 86:³⁷

eḷil koṅṭu miṅṅuk koṭi eṭuttu vēkat tolil koṅṭu tāṅ muḷaṅkit tōṅṅrum – eḷil koṅṭa nīr mēkam aṅṅa neṭumāl nīram pōlak kār vāṅṅam kāṅṅum kalantu.

Like graceful water clouds that appear, gracefully raising the banner of lightning, speedily taking up work, thundering, like of the colour of tall Māl the sky shows itself, mingled with rain clouds.

Possibly inspired by a rare type of Akam poem that begins with an aphoristic prelude, that is, a moral maxim that is then contrasted with a concrete situation, is Pū. 35:

*inīṭ’ enṅpar kāmam ataṅṅilum āṅṅa
inīṭ’ enṅpar taṅ nīrum entāy – inīṭ’ enṅru kāmam nīr vēḷātu niṅ perumai vēṅṅparēl cēmam nīr ākum cīṅṅitu.*

³⁷ Cf. Pē. 55, 87.

Sweet, they say, is passion, and sweeter than that, they say, is cool river water, o my father. If they,
 without desiring passion [and] water as sweet, desire your greatness,
 [your] protection has become [their] nature, a little bit.

For the last-but-one example, classification is more difficult, unless we want to think of the numerous confusion motifs prevalent both in Tamil and Sanskrit love poetry, where for example the girl's face may be taken for the moon. In Pē. 67, it is the lotus in the navel of the lord that is confused:

āṅku malarum kuviyūm māḷ unti-vāy
ōṅku kamalattiṅ oḷ pōtu – ām. kait tikiri cuṭar enrum veḷ caṅkam vāṅiṅ pakarum mati enrum pārttu[∞]

In the navel of Māl, where there are blossoms heaped, there is a bright bud of a high lotus – peering
 at the discus in [his] hand, thinking [it] the sun, [and] at the white conch, thinking [it] the moon that shines in the sky.

The final case, Pē. 84, is of a very different order and serves to remind us of the fact that human powers of observation and description are limited, and virtually all a singer of bhakti can achieve is just this – poetry –, while god stays of out of reach:

uḷaṅ āya nāl maraiyiṅ uḷ poruḷai uḷḷatt' uḷaṅ ākat tērnt' uṅarvarēlum – uḷaṅ āya vaḷ tāmarai neṭum kaṅ māyavaṅai yāvarē kaṅṭār? ukappar kavi.

Even though, as he is [already] in the heart, they search [and] perceive the inner meaning of the four Vedas that is him, who are those who have seen the cunning one with large eyes, lush lotuses, who [always] is [there]? They are those who rejoice in poetry.

³⁸ The three taniyan-s, “solitary stanzas”, connected with each of the early Antāti-s are not merely laudatory, but play an important and integral part in the text and its transmission in so far as it is only there that the respective authors, Poykai, Pūtam and Pēy, are named. Unlike for most of these verses, that tend to be difficult to date since the only evidence available is the author’s name ascribed by the Śrīvaiṣṇava tradition, we moreover get confirmation of their being in place as early as the Irāmānujanūrranāti (INA; when ever that was composed exactly) in the form of two intertextual reference to the stanzas for the first and the third Antāti-s in verse 8 and 10 of the INA respectively.

The lord³⁹ Poykai, battle bull among poets who hails from⁴⁰ Kaccinakar⁴¹ surrounded by flower groves joined by screw pines has lovingly made, for the genre to shine, [this] hundred Antāti [verses] in precious Tamil so that the servants (of god) may prosper in the world.

³⁹ The reference to Poykai as pirān, “lord”, is surprising and not found again in the taniyan stanzas to his two colleagues. The construction here allows us to read it differently and take pirān as an unmarked genitive to kaviñar: “battle bull among the poets of the Lord”. This was not, however, the traditional interpretation, because one of the intertextual references that connect this Antāti with the INA is precisely this odd designation of poykai pirān.

⁴⁰ The literal translation of vantu utitta would be “come [and] arisen from K.”

⁴¹ Kaccinakar, i.e. Kāñcipuram is mentioned as the birth place of the Āḷvār.

Unfortunately the overall numbering differs in the various editions; this version follows the Rājam edition.

⁴³ Here the text unequivocally reads nānkuka, from nānkutal, “to leave”, whereas the context suggests nāntuka, from nāntutal, “to swim”: the ocean of affliction is crossed by swimming. An emendation that would imply changing just two letters might be considered.

you blocked, burst [and on which] you closed [your] eyes, this is the earth you created, dug up, ate [and] spit out.

with one foot upto the measure of the water that envelops the earth, the great lord who saw the measure of the demon⁴⁷ in fearful form. I don't know a path⁴⁸ to see your measure.

⁴⁵ With arikelēn we have to ask whether we are still faced with the old type of auxiliary construction with kil-tal, “to be able to” (attested in the Antāti-s for example in Po. 56.3 kāṅ-kilān) or rather with a type of simple negative (irregular, since the normal forms with -il as an infix make use of the perfective stem, i.e., one would expect arintilēn). The context rather suggests a negative “I don't know”, but “I cannot know” is also possible.

⁴⁸ Here nerī appears to be used metaphorical in the sense of āru, “way”, which is not one of the standard transfers of meaning.

He who stood as the very portal to the path, by closing the portal of the senses that are five, [which is] the battle door, [him] Hara⁴⁹ knows in whose throat the poison rests, who that day taught the Dharma to the Four in the shade of the banyan.⁵⁰

⁴⁹ For proper nouns, mostly designations of a deity, in both Sanskrit and Tamil, and possibly with variations, see Appendix 1.

⁵¹ This is the first of a number of references to Hari-Hara, the deity consisting of both Viṣṇu and Śiva. Where the Śaiva devotees rather delegate Viṣṇu and Brahmā to a position of subservience, the Vaiṣṇava technique is for Viṣṇu to absorb the other two into his own person, Brahmā as an offshoot of his navel and Śiva as having a share of his body. Further passages are Po. 28.3f., 74, 98, Pē. 31.3f., 63.

⁵² marantu ariyēṇ: an absolute followed by a negative form of arital, “to know“, is an established idiom for not being able to do something, literally not knowing of doing it.

⁵³ The frequent expression kai toḷutal, literally “to worship with the hands”, is generally interpreted as the posture of worship and greeting with hands raised and put together also referred to as kai kūpputal, and as such the complex form is lexicalised. However, there is also another gesture still very important in worship and even ordinary respect for elders, and that is touching with one's hand the feet of the respected person. There does not seem to be an idiom for that, which is why one should perhaps consider whether kai toḷutal might not rather refer to the latter practice. There is at least one passage, namely in Po. 58.3 (māl aṭiyē kai toḷuvān, “in order to worship with the hands the feet of Māl”) that clearly supports such an interpretation.

⁵⁴ For the topos of regarding the lord already as embryo in the womb cf. Pū. 87.

The directions, the gods of the directions and all the rites pertaining to the gods [are] a confusion created by him with the colour of the rain flood who churned the ocean, tall Māl,⁵⁶ Kaṅṅaṅ of inexhaustible fame.

⁵⁶ One of the frequent designations for the god is neṭumāl or even the simple adjective with masculine suffix (neṭiyan or neṭiyōṇ). Within Vaiṣṇavism, this would appear to be a reference to his physical size, most probably based on his incarnation as vāmana, the dwarf who asked for the land covered by three of his steps and who then grew to cover the whole world with these three steps. However, the same epithet is found with Murukaṅ who is often called neṭu vēḷ. This gives rise to the question whether originally neṭu was not rather a respectful attribute and rather meant something like “high”. We should also take into consideration the fact that in the older metrical system both māl and vēḷ could not stand alone, but were in need of an attribute to make up a metrical foot. What comes closest in the Caṅkam formulaic system is the very frequent attribute to a king neṭu vēḷ, “a long spear”, and one wonders whether at the origin there was not some confusion in the transfer of royal to divine attributes.

why did you, Tirumāl, hide with a chariot wheel in [all]-encompassing fighting with [your] hand [holding] the battle discus?

⁵⁸ This passage must refer to a mythic episode from the Mahābhārata when Kṛṣṇa covers the sun in order to trick Jayadratha for Arjuna’s sake (who had vowed to kill his enemy before sunset or die himself). The means of doing so is not specified in the Sanskrit version, nor is it found in Harivaṃśa, Viṣṇupurāṇa or Bhāgavatapurāṇa. Periyālvār (4.1.8), as graciously pointed out to me by Lynn Ate, names the discus as the instrument (āli koṇṭu anru iravi maraippa). This is certainly more comprehensible than a mere chariot wheel.

⁶⁰ Here the original contains a double possessive mark, namely one possessive dative iṭantāy_{ku} and a pronoun 2.sg. un.

We can decide here to read with the Vyākyaṇam an extended meaning for the thrice repeated iyal(vu), that is, for iyal amarar “worthy immortals”, then we may join iyalvu...cella, “to go appropriately”, and finally iyalvāka...ōti, “reciting as is appropriate”.

saying ‘this one [or] this one is our great lord,’ by painting on the wall ⁶² Here the later editions reads cārttiyum, “approaching”, which in context with cuvar-micai is more difficult to understand (why approach a wall, even in case a locative would be acceptable?) but fits in with the etukai – most likely this has to be seen as a correction for the sake of the rhyme, but the editor understood the insertion of -r- as a etukai modification. Whether this is a hyper-correction of the original reading is open to discussion.

⁶³ The direct object of toluvar line 4 employs the noun mūrtti – otherwise not used in the Antāti-s, except in Po. 76.2 where the pronominal derivation mūrttiyar refers to human beings – in apposition to the ubiquitous uru/uruvu/uruvam, possibly simply induced by etukai.

⁶⁵ This poem might be the only example in the early Antāti-s to continue a subtype of the old Caṅkam messenger poem in which the love-lorn girl, unable to find a human messenger to send to her lover, addresses all manners of entities, sentient or insentient, either to send them on an errand or even simply to express her own sorrow at being left alone by the beloved. This type of poem was extremely successful from the Kīlkaṇakku Akam anthologies onwards and became even more so in the bhakti corpus – Nammāḷvar's Tiruvāymoli alone contains no less than four such decades, that is, 40 poems (TVM 1.4, 2.1, 6.1, 6.8), and even the Tēvāram contains one decade by Campantar (1.60). Here one might detect a direct echo of two poems from the Kuruntokai, skilfully weaving two strands of association together to create a new sentiment. The first is KT 163 that begins with yār aṇankurraṇai kaṭalē, “who tormented you, ocean?”, in the mouth of a bereft girl lying sleepless at night and wondering whether the sea is also in her situation. The second poem is KT 344 where a wife sees

In short, Poykai asks the sea which penance it has done so as not to be in the situation of the girl from KT 163.

⁶⁶ Here we have one of the very few passages in the corpus where there is a word split over the line boundary, and not even for metrical reasons but for the sake of etukai.

⁶⁷ This verse is elliptical in detail, but clearly implies more than one incarnation. The first phrase refers to the parents of Kṛṣṇa who were imprisoned by Kaṁsa, but the second phrase includes an unequivocal reference to the Vāmana incarnation.

Po. 48.4 71.3 Pū. 7.3 Pē. 24.4), understood by the tradition as a sort of adjective meaning “profound”, however, with unclear morphological status. To me it seems more likely that it has to be explained, in parallel to the well-known vāḷi of early classical literature, as a contracted subjunctive form for āl-ti/vāl-ti.

⁷⁰ The parallel occurrence of mārku and aṇaiyaṇ is syntactically awkward here, as they are clearly in apposition, one in a marked and the other in an unmarked possessive relationship to pātam.

Scarred were⁷¹ the palms⁷² that had touched the Śārṅga bow string, scarred were the feet, having kicked the cart, scarred were the fingers of him the colour of the swelling flood who dug into the chest of him named after gold,⁷³ so that she with the flower garland⁷⁴ was frightened.

⁷¹ Here irunta occurs three times, looking like a perfective peyareccam, but has to be analysed as neuter plural form and repeated main verb.

⁷² The original with aṅkai retains something that resonates as a śleṣa, namely on the one hand the compound, meaning “palm”, on the other hand the word split version am kai, meaning “beautiful hand”.

⁷³ Here poṇ peyarōṇ functions as a poetic designation of Hiranya, whose name incorporates one of the Sanskrit words for gold.

⁷⁴ pūm-kōtaiyāḷ has to be taken as an attributive designation “she with a flower garland”, although a standard metaphor compares the beauty of a woman to that of a garland in which her different body parts are described as particular flowers, as for example in Tirukkōvaiyar 1, which is why kōtai is even lexicalised as “woman”. However, since here we do not get a simple kōtai, but the pronominalised form with the suffix of f.sg. the attribution is unequivocally marked.

⁷⁵ Iruntilai has to be analysed as a very early occurrence of a new type of negation that uses the perfective stem and il as a negative infix; further occurrences cf. Po. 34.3, 79.3, Pū. 89.4. While later this type of form is atemporal, here one might wonder whether a past tense is meant. The final -ē has to be read as an interrogative particle.

Taking up words, my heart, without stopping, always rises praising him who, like the emerald on the mountain, rested on the waves, who tore open [Hiraṇya's chest],⁷⁶ who dug up the earth as a boar.

⁷⁶ Of the three actions expressed in three perfective 2nd sg. participial nouns. the middle one, kīṇṭānai, comes without an object. By comparing the use made of the verb kīḷ-tal, “to tear open” we find that it is used with three mythic events, namely with the splitting of Hiraṇya's chest, with tearing open the mouth of the bird (puḷ) or of the horse (mā), the latter both exploits attributed to Kṛṣṇa. Since the feats described here are references to different incarnations of the god, Hiraṇya and Narasiṃha might be the more likely option; Tārkkatīrttar Rāmānujācāryar opts for the former.

⁷⁷ The Tamil word viṅai, “action”, occurring but twelve times in the early Antāti-s, is used as a calque for Sanskrit karma throughout the bhakti period and beyond. Like karma it is in the first place neutral and has to be specified for being good (nal) or bad (aru, vem, tī, val), although if unspecified it tends to refer to bad karma. While the singular is often used to denote karma in general, the plural mostly refers to specific actions committed by an individual (cf. Po. 75.1, Pē. 76.4, 88.3).

⁷⁸ Here the context seems to presuppose understanding vaikal in the sense of vaikalum.

⁸² The variant form of matiḷ for matil is unequivocal in the context, but the TL does not include the word and the Cānti Cātaṇā dictionary quotes this passage only. According to the digital Tēvāram, however, for more than 200 occurrences of matil there are two with the retroflex (Tēvāram 1.67.6 and 7.97.9).

⁸³ A number of variations like malar makaḷ or malarāḷ refer to Śrī as “she from/with the [lotus] blossom”.

⁸⁴ I.e., Brahmā, who is frequently alluded to as being from Viṣṇu’s navel or from the lotus in the navel.

⁸⁵ The third deity to be in close proximity with Viṣṇu is Śiva, identified here as the destroyer of Tripuram; for further references to Hari-Hara, cf. Po. 5, 74, 98 Pē. 31.3f., 63.

⁸⁶ Here the reading of F3, although isolated, is perfectly comprehensible and even preferable, with the nominative n̄n̄nam followed by an other adverbial phrase teḷit' āka. The repetition from line 1 cannot really be counted as an objection, because in etukai the last foot of line 2 repeats eḷit' āka, so one way or another two out of three etukai forms are identical.

⁸⁷ Here both manuscripts attest simple juxtaposition which is equally plausible.

⁸⁸ puri in this context has to be seen as a short form for the famous valampuri, the “right-spiralling conch“, and as a poetic equivalent to caṅku.

⁸⁹ A formulaic parallel of the whole last line is found in Pē. 97.4. Slightly worrying in both instances is the position and function of tān, which looks awkwardly placed even for a mere emphatic.

⁹¹ pērntilaḷāl: for this type of negative form cf. Po. 24.3, with further parallels in Po. 79.3 and Pū. 89.4. Moreover, -āl has to be interpreted here as a conditional suffix, and the conditional as it is so often is used in a temporal sense.

⁹² The context allows three interpretations of uruki, firstly, as above, it might refer to the pose of the demonesse who pretends to have motherly feelings for Kṛṣṇa, secondly, it might refer to her inner dissolution that ends in death when Kṛṣṇa sucks her breast and, thirdly, it might be part of the description of the real mother, displaced for the sake of etukai.

⁹⁴ Is the function of enrē here merely that of an emphatic question mark?
Ought this to be understood as a temporal question “when”? One might be tempted to consider an emendation into anrē: “was is not?”

⁹⁵ This particular construction that puts the direct object of a verbal action into the nominative and the indirect object into the accusative is a typical Tamil type of cleft sentence, not rare in the Antāti-s; further examples are ⁹⁶ The term kēlvi is the Tamil calque of Sanskrit śruti and refers, presumably, to the earlier part of the Vedic textual tradition, although we have no means of knowing how well acquainted the early Āḷvārs were with the details of that tradition (Anṭāti parallels are Pū. 3.3 and, for the pronominal derivation kēlviyar, Pē. 85.2).

⁹⁷ An alternative interpretation might be vakai aru as the six aṅga-s, that is, the six auxiliary disciplines of Vedic lore.

⁹⁸ Here ūr, literally “village“, is used for its affective connotations, denoting that Māl has deep emotional ties with the place, even if in this case it cannot be said to be his birth place.

Vēṅkaṭam, where the crawling striped snake perceives the big gem, thrown by the illustrious¹⁰⁰ hill people, so that the big elephant moves on, as the lightning of the monsoon rain [and] reaches the ant hill, is the place of Māl of which the gods above say 'ours'.

⁹⁹ In this verse we find a peyareccam clause of space ranging over two and a half lines, as it is typical of the earlier Caṅkam corpus where usually it functions as an inset with a symbolically coded message. This type of description did not really make its way into bhakti literature and this is a rare example of its continuation, just as is the following verse 40; cf. also Pū. 53 and 75. Only Pēyālvār seems to have a predilection for this technique and devotes no less than seven verses to it (cf. Pē. 45, 58, 68, 71, 72, 75 and 89). The topos chosen is only partly well-attested: Tamil poetic snakes are notoriously frightened by lightning and thunder, and the people from the hills have to defend their millet crop against rampaging elephants – usually by wielding torches, but there do not seem to be direct parallels for their throwing jewels. On the contrary, the topos is that by night the snake deposits its jewel on the ground in order to hunt by its light.

¹⁰⁰ It is not clear at all how oḷ, usually a simple adjective “bright”, can be used as a epithet for the hill inhabitants (kuravar).

¹⁰⁴ Here puṛaṅ urai, “words behind the back”, that is, slanderous words, probably refers to one technique of bhakti song where the god is belittled or ridiculed for his deeds. The first clear examples of this are to be found in Pū. 15 and 19.

¹⁰⁶ Here the question is what might be the word of reference for the anaphoric subject of the second sentence, tāṇē. It can either be the preceding vinai, which would mean that grace to the lord the heretoforth bad karma now turns into good karma. Or else it can refer, a little more vaguely, to the more complex process of receiving the grace of the lord.

Whatever¹⁰⁷ form delights his people is just the form, whatever name delights his people again is the name, whatever colour his people delightedly keep thinking of without blinking, that is the colour of him with the discus.

¹⁰⁷ Here we see an early instance, thrice repeated, of Tamil trying to emulate the Sanskrit relative construction with yad – tad, here rendered by the proclitic short forms of the interrogative and the far-distant deictic pronouns e- and a-; another example is found in Pē. 21.

There are things not known to the immortals.¹¹⁰ Let that rest.

We, we can know [them], good heart – [those] qualities of the one who counted

¹⁰⁸ The strange form arikipōm gives rise to doubt as to whether to understand it as an intermittent formation of the not yet established present tense (for which the “correct” form would be arikinrōm) or as a late survivor of the old auxiliary construction with kil-tal, “to be able to”; for parallels cf. Po. 56.3 kāṅkilān, Pū. 16.4 pey-kirpār.

¹⁰⁹ Here instead of the instrumental form to be expected, pātattāl, we seem to have the usual oblique stem -attu added to, not replacing the noun ending -m of pātam. Tārkkatīrttar Rāmānujācāryar gives an alternative interpretation by glossing with appātattāl, that is, he suggests that for the sake of etukai the proclitic demonstrative pronoun a- is postpositioned and bearing the case suffix. One way or the other one would want parallels.

¹¹⁰ Here we may consider taking ariya not as the usual infinitive, but as a participial noun negative neuter plural, although the infinitive is likewise possible: “It is for the immortals to know.”

with [his] feet the tall heads of the Rākṣasa¹¹¹ with a sword¹¹² who had humbled himself at the feet of the one with great penance who resides in the flower.

¹¹¹ Rāvaṇa in his youth spent years of doing penance to gain the favour of Brahmā, in the process cutting off his own head ten times, each time growing a new one, ending up with all ten heads restored to him, only to lose them all in the end to Rāma.

¹¹² The attribute vāl to arakkāṇ (the Tamilised form of Skt. rākṣasa-) occurs in all the three places that arakkāṇ is used in the Antāti-s (Po. 45.3, Pū. 52.3, Pē. 77.2), here and in Pēy clearly referring to Rāvaṇa, presumably all three referring to the episode described in the preceding note, which would make the sword the weapon Rāvaṇa used to cut off his own head.

 so to end the karma of the one with a white sacred thread on his chest,¹¹⁴ who accepted gifts in the skull of the one with four Vedas he intoned, see, will rule the earth along with [enjoying] the pleasures of the immortals.¹¹⁵

¹¹⁴ The myth indicates that Viṣṇu filled the skull (~ Brahmā’s 5th head) that was the begging bowl in Śiva’s hand, with his own blood so as to rid Śiva of the curse of having that skull stuck to his hand, which was his punishment for having cut off that 5th head (cf. Pū. 17.3f., 63.1f.).

¹¹⁵ Here the confusing element is the instrumental suffix in pōkattāl. The primary function of this case suggests that the pleasures of the immortals would be the means to rule the earth which does not really seem to make sense. Context demands rather reading an instrumental for sociative in a slightly elliptical formulation: they will rule the earth and enjoy the pleasures of the celestials.

The other early instance attested is in Tiṇaimālai Nūrraimpatu 7.1, of roughly the same period if not later.

¹¹⁸ Periyavāccāṅ Piḷḷai identifies the demon whirled by the leg as Namuci, an enemy of Indra who, according to the Mahābhārata version, could not kill him on his own and needed the help of Viṣṇu, but this particular way of treating him appears to be otherwise only mentioned by Periyālvār Tirumoli 1.8.8.3f. maṅṅu namuciyai vāṇil cularriya | miṅṅu muṭiyanē, “the one with the flashing crown who swung enduring Namuci into heaven”.

Except for those who exert themselves¹¹⁹ so that [their] bodies are so emaciated that [they] alter to the likeness of a single makiḷ-seed,¹²⁰ it is difficult for those who [want to] see¹²¹ our First cause with the high crown of glowing gold¹²² that appears like a blooming radiance.

¹¹⁹ Here muyalkirpārkku, dat. of a participial noun honoric plural to muyal-tal, “to make an effort”, still looks like a form from the old auxiliary construction with kil-tal, “to be able to”, but that does not seem to make sense anymore, and it is more likely that we have to read it as an intermediate stage in the formation of the “modern” present tense.

¹²⁰ This stanza appears to advocate a sort of harsh penance for the devotees that is not normally seen as a part of bhakti religiosity and does not have parallels in the Antāti-s.

¹²¹ Here the customary syntactic pattern of aru with a verbal noun justifies a doubt as to whether to emend the slightly awkward kāṇpārkku to kāṇṭarṅku (difficult “to see”). However, a direct parallel is found in the contemporary Śaivite Antāti of Kāraikkālamaiyar, where verse 45, talking of lord Śiva, ends with kāṇpārkku eḷitu, “he is easy to see”.

¹²² Or: “the high crown of glowing gold is difficult [to see] even for those who see our first cause”, i.e. even they can see only part of him.

¹²³ I.e., the feet.

¹²⁴ The construction of this verse is ambiguous. I suggest to read a pūṭtu vil: “in order to see the feet easily, count (or reflect upon) the holy names”. In this case eṇ uḷḷam | teḷiya+ teḷint'-oḷiyum cevvē has to be regarded as an inserted clause with elliptical subject, with the implication that the holy names are a means to make the mind clear, with the consequence that also the contemplation on the holy feet remains focussed. Moreover the function of oḷital as an auxiliary is not clear; it might mean remaining in a state once reached.

¹²⁶ These groups of deities engaged in worship may be identified as eight Vasus, eleven Rudras, twelve Ādityas and two Aśvins.

¹²⁹ The figure of speech employed here, as noted by Lynn Ate, corresponds to the Sanskrit type of alāṅkāra called yathāsaṅkhyā, in which similar parts of speech are ordered and sequenced in pairs, “item one of the first sequence matches item one of the second sequence” (Gerow 1971: 222). The Tamil cannot be mirrored in a translation: while the first seven metrical feet enumerate the objects modified by the lord, feet eight to thirteen list the verbs that correspond to them; a second example is found in Pē. 60.

¹³⁰ According to the Vyākyaṇam, the snake referred to here is Kāliyaṇ (Skt. Kāliya) on whose hood Kṛṣṇa danced.

¹³¹ For the pot dance there are parallels in the other two Antāti-s; cf. Pū. 98 and Pē. 73. The texts remain ambiguous as to what he does with the pots, that is, whether he holds pots in his hands while dancing or whether he dances on a pot, but some parallels from the later corpus, graciously pointed out to me by Lynn Ate, allow a decision in favour of the first option: Periyālvār 2.7.7 reads kuṭaṅkaḷ eṭuttu ēra viṭṭu kūttāṭa, “while he dances the pot dance, letting go so as to rise lifting the pots”; Ciriyā Tirumaṭal, line 12 reads kuṭam iraṇṭu ēnti, “holding up two pots”, and Periya Tirumoli 9.8.6 gives kuṭam kalantu āṭi, “dancing joined with pots”.

¹³³ The expression namaṇ tamar, “Yama’s people”, refers to the helpmates of the god of death, who brings in humans for karmic reckoning, a procedure from which the devotees of the lord will be exempt.

¹⁴¹ The genitive avaṇatu can be taken in two ways, either as a possessive genitive which would make the lord the utterer of the words, in which case one might think of the Bhagavadgīta, or as a genitive for locative, in which case the words would be about him.

¹⁴² Tradition splits and reads line 4 as a separate sentence, which presupposes taking nayam as something negative: “I will not shamelessly associate with coveting [worldly goods].” Both noun and verb are too rare in the Antāti-s to find much support for either interpretation.

What is learned by the world, as it rises in the morning, and what is listened to are the names of the one who took the great discus. What is desired and sung by the highest brahmins who had before understood [and] learned [them] are the feet of the one on the sea with a unique discus.

¹⁴³ Slightly surprising here is the coordination of ōtuvatu, n.sg., with ōrppana, n.pl.; perhaps we have to understand that what is recited is one text in which the many names can be heard.

¹⁴⁸ The meaning of the phrase munp' ūli kāṇān is not obvious. The simple literal reading given above begs the question: why did god not see earlier aeons? The Vyākyaṇam, aware of the problem, suggests an elliptical direct object: ōr aṭi varaniṇṛāl kurramē aṇṛiyē kurram kiṭakkum nāḷum kāṇavariyān, “if you take one step towards him, he will find it difficult to see not just the offences [but] also the days you committed them”, in other words, he kindly overlooks past errancies.

However, two instances of what the Sanskrit tradition called nindāstuti, “praise by blame” are found in Pū. 15 and 19; cf. also Po. 41 and note.

Running, having thought ‘I can’t bear [to serve] the harsh enemies who approached’, are there servants except for [those] of the cunning one with dark body¹⁵⁸ who gave into the hand of the strong one

¹⁵⁸ One of the most frequent designations of the god in the Vaiṣṇava corpus occurs in three variations, namely māyōṇ, māyaṇ and māyavaṇ. While māyōṇ is not attested in the three early Antāti-s, the other two are. While māyōṇ most probably has to be seen as a simple Tamil derivation from mā, “dark” plus the pronominal suffix of the m.sg. -ōṇ, i.e. “the Dark one”, the other two allow for an alternative etymology. To be sure, both māyaṇ and māyavaṇ can also be interpreted as derivations of the same mā, one with the alternative m.sg. suffix -aṇ, the other with the full m.sg. pronoun -avaṇ as suffix. However, they can also be derived from the noun māyam, the Tamil counterpart of the Sanskrit māyā-, in the first case as the contracted form where the neuter ending is exchanged with the m.sg. ending -ṇ, the second case as ordinary pronominal m.sg. suffix -aṇ. The meaning in itself is ambivalent, as one with the power of māyā can be both a miraculous person and a trickster. The Vaiṣṇava poets seem to exploit the triple association and it is often difficult to justify a choice between them. The present translation opts for māyaṇ, “the Dark one”, on the basis of the consideration that māyōṇ is absent in the Antāti-s. For māyavaṇ, however, the

the poisonous snake that surrounded the firm big city?¹⁵⁹

attribution at least in the passage here with mā mēṇi suggests that the association is rather that of māyam.

¹⁵⁹ According to Virarākavācāryaṅ, this snake surrounding the city is named Sumukaṅ (Skt. Sumukha), seeking refuge from Garuḍa with Viṣṇu but finally handed over to him, not to be killed but to be protected – as so often the details are allusive.

Vēṅkaṭam, that magically absorbs stains,¹⁶⁰ so that the stars vanish in between the incense offered together with strands of fresh flowers on the twelfth day by those with sword eyes that they wear as weapons,¹⁶¹ is the mountain of him who on a former day took aim with great magic.

¹⁶⁰ Here mācūṇum appears to be an isolated form not known to the TL. Tārkkatūrttar Rāmānujācāryar glosses with aḷukkataiyum paṇṇānir̥kum. Morphologically it looks like a peyareccam based on the root noun ūṇ, “eating”, instead of the verb uṇṇutal. Can it be “stain-absorbing” = sin-absorbing?

 alone exists for himself. Besides, when I see the complexion ¹⁶⁵ Tārkkatūrttar Rāmānujācāryar wants to understand ākutal in the sense of being equal to (oppuṭal), but I rather think that the poet plays here with a topos known from Akam poetry, namely the state where one sees the beloved in everything that is in sight, here the ironwood- and bilberry flowers. The statement about the lord's self-sufficiency adds the nuance that even if he does not grace the devotee with an appearance, he is always already visible on earth in any object reminiscent of his colour. More than half of this slightly cryptic stanza is quoted by Tirumaḷicai (Antāti 51): eṇakk' āvār ār oruvarē. em perumāṇ | taṇakk' āvāṇ tāṇē marr' allāl puṇa+ kāyā | vaṇṇāṇē unṇai+ piṇar ariyār. “Who else would be the one that is for me?  flower form by tainted nails, destroying [him] so that he lost [his] strength on your red feet?¹⁶⁸

¹⁶⁷ Here vāḷ uruvi, “in a form of light”, is yet another metaphor on the name of Hiraṇya, the golden one.

¹⁶⁸ The above translation presumes that the lord spoiled the beauty of his flower-like hands by getting them soiled with blood. It is also possible to construe differently, taking porī ukirāl as the instrument of cerru: “destroying [him] with [your] clotted nails so that he lost [his] strength on your red feet.” In that case, pū vaṭivai ṭalitta ought to be read as an attribute of the discus, āli: “o you with the golden discus in [your] hand that put to shame the beauty of flowers.”

 perhaps best understood as something like “precious one”.

¹⁷² This is an allusion to an episode from the Vāmana story, namely the dwarf’s was to become Gaṅgā, to be brought to earth through Śiva’s hair; cf. Pē. 6

¹⁷⁵ Kaṭaṇmallai, literally "Mallai by the sea", is identified as Mahabalipuram and Pūtattālvār's place of origin.

¹⁷⁶ muttukkaḷ cērum, "joining pearls", here has to be read as a variation on the frequent metaphor of a devotional poem being a garland of words (col mālai). "anpē takaḷi" aḷittāṇ is a reference back to the author Pūtam whose text begins with those words and who in doing so has brought fame to himself.

If one perceives well by cognition the names of Nāraṇaṇ [and] moreover pronounces his names in [his] place,¹⁷⁷ [that] will make [us] into immortals adorning heaven. That is, isn’t it, the nature¹⁷⁸ of our king of the humble immortals.

¹⁷⁷ The word tānam allows for various interpretations depending on which word in Sanskrit it is derived from, sthāna- (“location”) or dāna- (“gift”). Since in the parallel in Pū. 52.3 it clearly refers to a place (vāṇavar kōṇ tānattu = Indra’s heaven) I suggest that the recitation of the lord’s names here takes place in his temple. With the other etymology we might, however, read: “and moreover pronounces his names copiously”.

¹⁷⁸ The noun paricu is problematic. Traditionally traced back to Sanskrit sparsa- (“touch”), it takes on a variety of connotations in Tamil, “nature, quality” being one of them. The only Antāti parallel is found on Po. 50.2, where it is used adverbially and rather in the sense of vaṇṇam (“manner”). Here and in the beginning of the next verse, one might also consider the meaning “gift” which is frequent in modern Tamil but appears attested in the Śaiva corpus for example in Tiruppallāṇṭu 10.

Those who worship the feet of the one from the milk ocean with excellent¹⁷⁹ fragrant blossoms, it seems as if¹⁸⁰ they will get to enter the city of the king of good immortals, with an appearance of light that shines with the aural teaching of the ancient immortals¹⁸¹ who worship [him].

¹⁷⁹ Or “with fragrant blossoms as a gift.”

¹⁸⁰ In pōl ām, line 2, pōl is ignored by the Tārkkatīrttar Rāmānujācāryar, but from the point of view of morphology, there are two possible interpretations, namely either a verbal root pōl (“to be similar”) plus ām for ākum as habitual future, or a contracted verbal noun pōl for pōkal (“to go”) plus ām for ākum. For the former, one would rather expect the direct form pōlum (cf. verse 5.1), while the latter could here be understood in the sense of a modern optative form: “let us go (and act just like these devotees).” A possible parallel is to be found in Periyatiruvantāti (PTA) 55.3, where however the dative of the personal pronoun rather supports a literal interpretation: emakk' avarai+ kāṇal ām eppōtum uḷḷāl, “for us there always is [the possibility of] seeing him with the mind.” [Further parallels: PTA 69.3f. cintanaiyēn tannai | yārkk' aṭal ām, Po. 100.2 īr aṭiyum kāṇal ām eṅ neñcē, Pē. 79.2 pērttāl pirapp' eḷum pērkkal ām.]

took pity on you [and] constantly gave you [her] breast, will she, in return for this disposition, justly reach the world surrounded by the great sea¹⁸⁴ that you measured in superior fashion¹⁸⁵ that day?

¹⁸⁴ Here the attainment of the world may relate to two different topoi. The first belongs to earlier Akam and Puṇam poetry and concerns recompensation of acts of kindness or of braveness already in this life: the mother who suckled Kṛṣṇa will live happily and prosperously in this world. The second is the bhakti topos of escaping rebirth, and in this case we would have to understand another type of rhetorical question, with a slightly different interpretation of pērttu: “will she again reach the world (i.e., will she be reborn)?”, the expected answer being: “no”.

¹⁸⁶ This verse enumerates a triad of gods who stand in worship of Viṣṇu, namely Sūrya, Brahmā and Śiva. A triad usually refers to the trimūr̥ti of Viṣṇu, Brahmā and Śiva, and indeed there are other instances when the two “lesser” gods, Brahmā and Śiva, pay homage to Viṣṇu, but the presence of Sūrya is not clear. In Pē. 97 we find a similar triad where the first member is, according to the commentaries at least, Indra.

Without talking to those who live here with guilt [and] sin, making [their] bellies great places,¹⁸⁷ o foolish people, reciting the names of the one possessing four arms that stretch to¹⁸⁸ all eight directions, turn [to him and] make yourselves pure.¹⁸⁹

¹⁸⁷ Here Tarkkatīrttar Rāmānujācāryar glosses pati with ūr, but one might also take it as a Sanskrit derivation from pati-, “lord”, and understand that these foolish people make their bellies their masters (oral suggestion by Lynn Ate).

¹⁸⁸ Here pērtta poses a semantic problem; while the current meaning of peyarttal is “to destroy”, the context demands something like “to reach” or “to stretch to”.

¹⁸⁹ This verse contains the only occurrence of the designation tīrtakarar, clearly a derivation from Sanskrit tīrthakara-, “making a ford, a passage”, traditionally referring to a Jina, but the Tamil meanings for tīrttam include “ritual purity”, which would bring it closer to the Tarkkatīrttar Rāmānujācāryar’s gloss jakattai paricuttappaṭuttukiravarkaḷ.

That he wandered, urging the chariot in hot battle, that day, that he separated from Sītā, going after the deer,¹⁹⁰ and that he desired to have a bed on the ground¹⁹¹ – is that [so] beautiful[ly done] by the one¹⁹² who has [his] cool bed on the snake?

¹⁹⁰ When Rāvaṇa wanted to lure Rāma away from Sītā, he sent his uncle Marica in the form of a golden deer – a rarity coveted by Sītā, who sent her husband out to catch it for her so that she remained behind alone and vulnerable; cf. Pē. 52.2.

¹⁹² Here we find the first of two instances (Pū. 15 and 19) of a poetic figure that is called nindāstuti in the Sanskrit tradition, i.e., a verse where the praise of god is cloaked by slighting him, a figure much more prominent in the Śaiva tradition, taking up, for example, the whole of the 12th section of the Tiruvācakam.

 is holding Māl so that he is close to [one's] mind. Except for this¹⁹³ when one acts in a manner that a sand bank in the forest may become a lake,
 who else will be able¹⁹⁴ to pour the rain?

¹⁹³ In this highly elliptical verse itu must refer back to the act of falling into servitude just mentioned. The message then would be that just as one can only submit to god and hope that he will accept one as a devotee, one can only heap up sand so as to make a receptacle for water, but one cannot actually make the rain to fill the lake: in both cases it is god who has to act.

around¹⁹⁵

the king of the celestials [and] the one on the great flower bow, the one with red matted hair in which the unique crescent moon sits took his¹⁹⁶ request to Māl, begged [and] succeeded.¹⁹⁷

¹⁹⁵ Here the adverbial currum (“all around”) is slightly problematic, since it is difficult to see how two people (Indra and Brahmā) can bow all around the lord; perhaps we have to understand that they just crowd in on him in support for the request made by Śiva.

¹⁹⁶ For metrical reasons the two absolutives irantu and koṇṭu appear separated while it makes perfect sense to read them as one complex verb form irantukoṇṭu, “begging on one’s own behalf”, which can be rendered in the translation by a possessive pronoun before kurai.

¹⁹⁷ This is a slightly veiled reference to Śiva asking Viṣṇu for help to get rid of Brahmā’s skull, which was stuck to his hand (cf. Po. 46.1-3, Pū. 63.1f.).

²⁰² In this verse it is not clear what is the relation between cintai (l. 1) and maṇam (l. 4). The translation takes them in apposition to each other, repeating the same idea twice with semantic variation, but it would also be possible to take cintai as the content of the maṇam, i.e., something like “the thoughts that settle... – in/from the mind...”

I think of Tirumāl in order to see his extended arms.

Those who think [thus] are not due for [another] birth. Those born in the house, those who worship²⁰⁸ those arms have abandoned all the great pleasures obtained from being born.

²⁰⁸ Here we have another instance of perfective active being not used as a past tense: literally we would have to understand: “those who have started to worship the arms have [thereby] given up pleasures.”

 you joined the shoulders of the girl on the flower, o Māl, you went [and] joined the mountain Māḷiruñcōlai²¹² surrounded by the wide dark earth, with slopes dark with bamboo.

²¹¹ The first line may be understood as a reference to mastering both śruti and smṛti, the Veda being the god-given part, whereas nīti means the tradition of dharma, beginning with the man-made dharmasūtra-s.

²¹² This probably is a reference to another important temple, namely māḷiruñcōlai on Iruṅkuṅṅam in the Maturai region, mentioned as early as in Paripāṭal 15. We could read māyiruñcōlai as a etukai-induced variation of māḷiruñcōlai, or take mā-y as a simple adjective “big” with an irregular sandhi for mā-v. The short designation Iruñcōlai is found also in Pū. 54. Tārkkatūrttar Rāmānujācāryar, however, sees things differently and identifies the mountain as Vēṅkaṭam.

²¹⁵ Here vāṅavar kōṅ, “the king of celestials”, refers not to Viṣṇu but to Indra, and the place of that king is the world to which, by time-honoured tradition, fallen warriors go, as is confirmed by Tārkkatīrttar Rāmānujācāryar.

²¹⁶ For the attribute vāḷ added to arakkaṅ, cf. note on Po. 45.3. The one referred to is presumably Rāvaṇa, or at least the only two further Antāti parallels refer to him (Po. 45.3, Pē. 77.2).

²¹⁷ For this earlier type of inset clause typical of Caṅkam literature cf. note on Po. 38, with further parallels in Po. 40, Pū. 75, Pē. 45, 58, 68, 71, 72, 75 and 89.

²¹⁸ Here tālntu has to be read not as an absolutive but as the short form of the perfective participial noun n.sg. in apposition to kuḷal karrai.

²²⁵ With māṇi, “dwarf”, the adjective karu may have several meanings. The modern glosses opt for colour, “black/dark dwarf”, which could be seen as overlaying Vāmana with attributes of Kṛṣṇa. To me it rather looks like a reference to the fact that the dwarf is not all that is there: he will begin to grow as soon as his boon is granted.

of him in whose navel dwells a red lotus flower.²³⁰

²²⁹ Here we see one of the two proper present tense forms that are found in the early Antāti-s, this one a peyareccam, while in Pū. 87.1 there is a 1st person singular, arikiṇrēn.

²³⁰ Here Tārkkatīrttar Rāmānujācāryar suggests to change back the word-order that had been altered for the sake of etukai to cem kamalam pū mēvum.

²³¹ The epithet ēvalla might be interpreted as a contracted form of ēvuvalla: “who has the power of command”. The Vyākyaṇam goes in the same direction in glossing with cakravartin.

²³⁸ Here all the editions read molintu-piṇ, absolutive instead of the form to be expected in a temporal clause with piṇ, namely the peyareccam that is found with the manuscript (cf. Pū. 78.4 toḷuta piṇ).

b. with the discus shining with flesh²⁴⁰

²⁴⁰ For ūn there is only one Antāti parallel in Po. 90.4, where it clearly means the same as ūn, “flesh”, since the flesh of Hiranya is dug up there. Thus an alternative interpretation might be considered, namely the Puṛam image of a weapon still bearing traces of the bodies it has killed.

²⁴⁵ The compound karuk-kōṭṭi looks like a deformation of the Sanskrit compound garbhakoṣa- or garbhakośa-, “uterus“; the Tamilised form to be expected would be -kōṭṭam (otherwise attested is kōcam for kośa-), while -kōṭṭi ought to go back to goṣṭhī, “assembly“, which does not really make sense.

²⁴⁷ For this type of negative form cf. Po. 24.3, with further parallels in Po. 34.3 and 79.3.

²⁴⁸ pataviyāy poses a problem here. It might go back to an adverbial usage of patavi, “station”, but tradition takes it as a special agent noun based on the noun patavu, “mildness” (DEDR 3905), that is, “as a mild person”.

²⁵² For this type of cleft construction, see note to Po. 36.1, with further parallels in Po. 90.3f and in Pū. 99.4, Pē. 98.4. The Dhānava referred to here is Hiraṇya.

²⁵³ This verse consists of a series of pronominal nouns in masculine singular, none of which is expressly marked as a predicate noun. I suggest singling out peyarttān because it is the only verbal form, although it might well be used as participial noun, not a finite form. The perfective here expresses that he is the one who has started the cycle of aeons and will continue it.

²⁵⁴ Atti is understood as a toponym by Tārkkatīrttar Rāmānujācāryar, without, however, giving a more precise location. The corpus does not contain any parallel except for the very next stanza, which has the Antāti beginning atti ūrān. Otherwise consider it as a derivation of Skt. abdhi “sea”.

²⁵⁵ The word imaiyōr, “those who do not blink“, is a frequent designation of the gods in the Vaiṣṇava corpus, in agreement with the Sanskrit topos of the gods being recognisable by three characteristics: their unblinking eyes, the fact that their feet do not touch the ground and, finally, that the flowers in their garlands never fade. It is as yet attested only twice in the early Antāti-s, namely here and two verses ahead, in Pū. 99.1.

²⁶⁰ Here atan, a neuter singular oblique of the demonstrative stem, has to be seen as just an extension of tirukōvalūr.

²⁶¹ Although the wording of the stanza suggests that Tirukōvalūr, i.e. Tirukkōyilūr in the South Arcot district, is one of the temples favoured by Pēyālvār, since it is not one actually sung by him (but cf. Po. 77.2, 86.3 Pū. 70.3), we may conclude that this reference alludes to his birth place, as would be part of the customary information found in an author taṇiyān.

He is the four Vedas that are well recited, the one of the colour of the torrent of the foaming, flooding²⁶⁹ waterfall in which honey drips,²⁷⁰ the one of the milk ocean with conches [and] waves, the one on the snake bed, the one of the sea of treatises by those of well-trained discourse,²⁷¹ the one of subtle knowledge.

²⁶⁹ Here ōtu, induced by the etukai, is best explained as non-lexicalised variant of ōtam, “flood”. The series of three nouns ōtu, aruvi and punal probably is an intensifying conglomeration from the same word field, ōtu denoting a flood as such, aruvi water flowing down from a height and punal a big amount of water that comes from fresh rains. Alternatively, one may consider a etukai deformation of the verbal root ōṭu, “to run”.

²⁷⁰ Here iriyum, peyareccam of irital, normally something like “to retreat, to flee”, poses a semantic problem. Perhaps, thinking of the concurrent early topos of fruit falling into the waterfall or pond, we have to understand that there is a residue of honey in the water.

²⁷¹ That is, he is the master of all knowledge that is laid down in treatises composed by scholars, and that in its entirety is as vast as the sea.

²⁷³ Here aṇintaṅku poses a morpho-syntactical problem. From the point of view of content, it clearly modifies aṇantaṅ and as such should be peya-reccam, but aṇintaṅku can be analysed either as the comparative absolute form or as an absolute aṇintu plus aṅku, “there”. One might argue that a comparative is not necessary here because the hood of the snake is often described as actually carrying jewels, not only shining as if it did, but even so the expected form would be aṇinta.

 that bud for bees to go into [the flower] tubes [and] fill themselves up, while others²⁷⁷ with pretty wings that measured heaven [and] earth²⁷⁸ hum desirously.

²⁷⁶ mālāy has to be analysed as an early occurrence of the modern type of adverb formation, occasionally already found also in the Kīlkkāṇakku with -ā (verbal root) or -āka (infinitive) as a suffix, such as puṛamāka, “outside” in Tiṇaimālai Nūṛraimpatu 117.3.

²⁷⁷ The two words for the two different kinds of bees are vaṇṭu and curumpu.

²⁷⁸ Here the trivikrama standard motif of measuring heaven and earth is playfully attributed to the bees, in an extension of the old Akam topos of bees being connoisseurs of all the flowers that exist.

because of the churning stick in [the hand of] the cowherdess,
o mother,²⁸⁰

the lord who had drunk the milk of the demoness with sharp teeth.

²⁷⁹ With the second predicate, we face semantic problems. In theory we can split either anru miṭaintatu or anrum iṭaintatu, both options being attested in the modern glosses, but it has to be kept in mind that in the case of iṭaital we have to read anrum instead of anru, which does not seem to make sense. The verb iṭaital, “to be wearied”, is, firstly, rare, and secondly not well in accordance with the prowess of the lord. I opt for the other possibility, miṭaital, which frequently means “to be set close”, but which might also refer to involvement on the part of the lord: “to be mingled in”.

²⁸⁰ The inserted vocative ammaṇē is slightly awkward here, since the word usually refers to a goddess or mother. Tradition interprets it as an exclamation of surprise.

These are temples of him:²⁸⁴ the one who became the lion form, performing a pounding of Hiraṇya's chest, the one on the snake that does not perceive with the ears, the one in the four Vedas, the one with him who receives the [Gaṅgā's] nectar as part, the one on the milk ocean.

²⁸³ Here avai has to be analysed as a root noun unattested by the TL, from the verb avaittal, “to pound”.

²⁸⁴ This verse is puzzling because the simple and straightforward main sentence suggests that what will follow is an enumeration of temples, but instead we see an enumeration of incarnations and forms of iconic representation. This may either be interpreted as a poetic hyperbole: he is present in all these forms as he would be in a temple, or we have to take verse 32 not as in isolated stanza, but take all the forms just as appositions to avan and link the main sentence with the enumeration of temples in fact found in the subsequent stanza 32. Against such an interpretation one might argue that, firstly, it would appear to be the only instance of such an enjambement in the Antāti-s and that, secondly, verse 32 has a perfectly good main sentence of its own.

²⁸⁸ Here the reading of EK, acavu, does not seem to be attested elsewhere (and is not followed by the Rājam edition), while the manuscript reads a perfectly normal acaivu. It is, however, possible to interpret acavu as a shortened root noun from acācutal, “to languish”, which would be within the same semantic range as acaivu.

²⁸⁹ The pronominal noun toṅkaḷān, m.sg., is based on a rare noun toṅkaḷ, “hanging, pendant, garland”, that appears to be attested only thrice further in the NTP, namely in Periyālvārt Tirumōḷi 25.1, in Periya Tirumōḷi 9.10.5 and in Tiruvāymoḷi 7.5.7. Since it attracts bees, it probably has to be made of flowers.

where the rutting bull elephant out of desire sulks with [his] dark cow, runs about, fights out of anger [and] drops pearls from [his] wide, excellent white tusks,²⁹⁶ is the mountain of him who on an earlier day took the earth on [his] tusk.

²⁹⁵ For this earlier type of inset clause typical of Caṅkam literature cf. note on Po. 38, with further parallels in Po. 40, Pū. 53 and 75, Pē. 58, 68, 71, 72, 75 and 89. This one is based on the well-established Pālai topos of the elephant feeding its hungry cow, showing the aruḷ expected from the god.

²⁹⁶ The mountain scene depicted here is familiar only in part. While there are parallels for the pearls stored in the elephant's tusk (cf. Kuṛiṅcippāṭṭu 35, 36 nel koḷ neṭu vetirkku aṅanta yāṅai | muttu ār maruppiṅ iṅaṅku kai kaṭuppa), a quarrel between the male and the female elephant does not seem attested elsewhere. Is it perhaps that we have to take the sociative piṭiyōṭu rather as an instrumental which would make her the cause of the fight: “where the rutting bull elephant desirously quarrels on account of a female...”?

³⁰⁰ This is the only passage where the lord is supposed to bend (cāyttal) the marutam trees, as is otherwise said of the kuruntu (cf. Po. 62.1 et al.); normally he goes between them, as in Pē. 54.2: marutiṅ uṭu pōy.

³⁰¹ Viṣṇu's heaven, Vaikuntam, is named a single time in the Antāti-s, namely in Pē. 61.1; others passages just call it nakar or nakaram with various epithets (cf. Po. 77.1 tirunakar, Pū. 3.4 kōmān nakar, 88.3f. vāṇōr...nakar).

³⁰² The rare toponym ilaṅkāpuram is interpreted as Rāvaṇa's capital city on Laṅkā.

³⁰⁵ This verse might best be understood as an adaptation of the Akam jealousy topos. After the lord has rescued the earth and won her heart (expressed here metaphorically as splitting her chest), Śrī sits on his chest and yet the third woman, presumably Nappiṇai, is in love with him too.

In that case, the passage would constitute one of the earliest pieces of evidence for Pāñcarātra influence on the Tamil bhakti corpus.

³⁰⁹ For this earlier type of inset clause typical of Caṅkam literature cf. note on Po. 38, with further parallels in Po. 40, Pū. 53, 75, Pē. 45, 68, 71, 72, 75, 89. The depiction of monkeys as a human couple making love is a familiar Caṅkam topos, to be seen for example in Kuruntokai 69, where the widowed female monkey commits suicide by throwing herself from a precipice.

³¹⁰ According to Kōvintasāmi Nāyūṭu, this line refers to the lord's intention of getting back the earth from Mahābali.

³¹¹ Here the form karru may be understood as a rarer type of adjective formation based on the noun kaṇru, “calf”; the most famous example of this formation is no doubt found in the title cilappatikāram, with cilappu derived from cilampu.

³¹³ Slightly disconcerting in this verse is that we have one designation for the lord in line 2 which makes use of the honorific form (uraivārkkku), while line 4 refers to him as a prince in masculine singular (kumaraṅ). We might consider reading uraivārkkku instead as a slightly elliptical reference to his devotees who take (~ perceive; koṇṭu) Vēṅkaṭam, the milk ocean and Vaikuntam as his abodes and dwell there to do worship, but that, while working nicely for Vēṅkaṭam, is somewhat more difficult to imagine for the latter two places.

³¹⁴ Here one may ask whether akatta (adj. instead of the current oblique akattu) is simply used as a very peculiar type of locative suffix or whether there is a special significance, such as a metaphorical meaning of akam in the sense of interior ~ heart, in which case maṇ could be read as a metonymy for the inhabitants of the earth: “Southern Kuṭantai that is in the heart of [the people of] the earth.”

³¹⁵ Here Pēyālvār treats us to a poetic time paradox in that the earth once taken by the lord in three steps during his dwarf incarnation is mapped out as a list of temples and holy places belonging to the poet’s own period.

³¹⁹ Hiranya's son was Prahlāda, a faithful devotee of Viṣṇu who had no part in his father's misdeeds.

³²³ The subject in this verse is simply elliptical, but the further description suggests a girl, which would make this another type of Akam adaptation, the only one in the Antāti-s, a girl in love with the god seeking every opportunity to be close to him – in that case we have to think of the girl’s mother as the speaker of the poem, as later is often the case in Nammālvār’s Tiruvāymoḷi.

³²⁴ In this clause the object of Kṛṣṇa’s wrath, that is, the person who came to death by wrestling is elliptical, but the easiest option is the wrestlers sent by Kaṃsa to attack him.

where the bull elephant stands [and] trumpets after having, trunk raised so that it pierces the clouds, run at [and] killed the Yāḷi,³²⁶ so that it fell, roaring, [its] paw broken by the shining tusk, is the hill of him who on a former day threw the young calf.

³²⁵ For this earlier type of inset clause typical of Caṅkam literature cf. note on Po. 38, with further parallels in Po. 40, Pū. 53, 75, Pē. 45, 58, 71, 72, 75 and 89.

³²⁶ The word yāḷi or āḷi denotes one, or may be even two, mythical animals already present in Caṅkam times. What can be said with confidence is that they are counted among predators (cf. for example Kuṛiṅcippāṭṭu 252 where the āḷi – glossed as yāḷi by Nacciṅārkkīṇiyar – is enumerated among the dangers the lover might encounter on his way to the night tryst). It is not clear whether this animal corresponds to the iconographic depictions of a creature with a lion's face but an elephant's trunk.

³²⁸ The position of the absolutive cenru is slightly awkward, since syntax suggests to read the preceding kai as its direct object. It seems better to accept a subject-change and take kai as subject, which leaves us with a semantic embarrassment since cel-tal, “to go”, is not usually employed for the action of hands.

³²⁹ kōḷ is the Tamil calque of Sanskrit graha, “planet“, and is here used to refer to Rahu, the cosmic snake that periodically swallows the moon and has to be induced to set it free again.

³³⁰ According to Tarkkatīrttar Rāmānujācāryar, this means the nityasūri, who are forever young.

³³¹ Here mēlai can be taken in a spatial or also in a temporal sense as “earlier”.

³³⁶ The word-play on the two poetic meanings of the word vēṅkai, firstly, “kino tree”, and, secondly, “tiger” (since the trailing flower clusters with petals and pollen of the kino tree together make a pattern in black, white and yellow that is reminiscent of a tiger's fur) is lost in translation.

³⁴⁵ This meaning for kēḷviyar is based on the assumption that kēḷvi is a calque for Skt. śruti. This has interesting implications for the interpretation of this verse, namely a dichotomy between sacred texts in Tamil, produced by the bhakti poets (kaviyīnār), and in Sanskrit, the Vedic recitations of the kēḷviyar, already for this period.

³⁵⁵ This is an elliptical reference to Śrī who is frequently designated as malarāl, “she from the blossom”.

³⁵⁶ For a formulaic parallel of the last line, see Po. 31.4.

³⁵⁷ Here Māl appears to be identified with three further deities, the latter two of whom are easily identifiable as Brahmā from the lotus flower and Śiva with the ascetic hair style. The first one, however, is not as obvious. Kōvintasāmi Nāyūṭu's gloss is kāñci malar pōṇra niraṭaiyūṭaiyān intiraṅ, “Indra whose colour resembles that of the Portia flower”. In this context see also Pū. 12, where a triad of Sūrya, Brahmā and Śiva is said to worship Viṣṇu.

Theological Concepts According to the Three Early Antāti-s of Poykaiyālvār, Pūtattālvār and Pēyālvār

The three Antāti-s of the Nālāyirat Tivvyappirapantam, given here in translation in the chronological order of Poykaiyālvār, Pūtattālvār and Pēyālvār, are witnesses to a special stage in theistic development, offering a particular view into the complex movement towards the eventual acceptance of a supreme deity. Such a deity stands at the beginnings of a distinctive theology, which in the course of its development from the Nālāyirat Tivvyappirapantam up to the theistic Vedānta of the Viśiṣṭādvaita continues to unfold.

By following this movement, the reader is not only able to situate these Antāti-s in the history of this religious tradition of auspicious (śrī) Vaiṣṇavavism, but also to see the components from which the image of this supreme deity has been modeled. From the perspective of the poets of these three texts, various strands of components are used to support the belief that there is one, unique god.

But how do these early sources characterize this god from a theological perspective? Is it possible to detect recurring characteristics in these three Antāti-s by which the god might be described in a way we consider “theological”,¹ as for example the idea of eternal omnipresence? Before I demonstrate the relevance of this idea – eternal omnipresence is in fact considered to be present in the devotee as well as in the universe – I will provide a few remarks about important aspects of this god.

The descriptions of one god use various names for him: Kaṇṇaṇ, Nāraṇaṇ/Nārāyaṇaṇ, Tirumāl, Neṭumāl, Ceṅkaṇmāl or Māyaṇ/Māyavaṇ.² And this god is not an abstract, placeless entity but is linked to real locations, such as Tirukkōṭṭi, Vēṅkaṭam, Kuṭamūkku, Tiruvaraṅkam, Māmallai, Kōval, and Kuṭantai. What is meant is not a deification of the place, but god's real presence in that place. What is theologically relevant is that god's omnipresence is expressed in the fact that he is one god who is named in many ways and is present in every place: Henotheism and Locotheism are expressed at the same time.³

His main attributes are frequently mentioned: fighting with a discus (āli) in his hand (kai), blowing a right-spiralling conch (valampuri, puri, kōṭu, caṅkam, nantu), having a bird (puḷ) as his vehicle (Po. 21), and having a serpent (pāmpu) as his bed (aṇaiyāṇ). His body is the colour of the ocean (nīr ōtam mēṇi Pū. 11; ōtam nīr vaṇṇanaṇi Po. 6). A cosmological paradigm connected to the colour of the ocean has been suggested by Katherine K. Young [2019: 123ff.]: the ocean or an ocean god

² For a detailed discussion of “Proper Names found in the Āntātis” see Young 2019: 173-181.

³ Hardy points out (1983: 283) that the Ālvārs “broke away in favour of the conception of Māyōṇ as the sole absolute in the strict sense”. It demonstrates the tendency to oneness, but not by exclusion (cf. Poykai verses 5, 98/74; Pey 63). He summarizes (p. 284): “for the Early Ālvārs Māl is the absolute god ... but not the impersonal brahman; he is residing in Vaikuntam, in the perfect great town,’ in ‘the eternal place’ and in the country of the world above’.”

“has the basic structure of destruction of the earth/world/universe by a flood or the god swallowing it,” which, after an interim is then followed by “its rescue or re-creation”.

While it receives less emphasis, another characteristic feature of the god is how he relates to the Veda. It is remarkable that no conflict between the god and the Veda is mentioned; indeed, there is no doubt that the god’s existence is based on the eternal Veda.

Nevertheless the god himself is put into the foreground in relation to the Veda, which is used by him as a refuge (araṇ) for his devotees (Po. 60). God shows himself to the Veda experts, who come to him (Po. 94). The Veda as well as the experts are subordinated to god. This is obvious when Pokaiyālvār mentions that these experts come to the place where god resides: “Vēṅkaṭam, where Veda experts arrive from all directions [and] bow” (Po. 37 ticai ticaiyiṅ vēṅiyarkaḷ cenr’ iraiñcum vēṅkaṭamē). In mythological terms, the superiority of god over the Veda is expressed in the fact that the god Brahmā, named as Veda expert, springs from the navel of Nārāyaṇa during creation: “The righteous Veda expert [comes] from your navel”. (Po. 28: ceyya maraiyāṅ niṅ untiyāṅ.)

The Veda makes god accessible by its reciting, and is a testimony for the god (Po. 37; 94). But even if the devotee can approach him by reciting the Vedas, the god of the Veda (in this context, the name Māl or Nāraṇaṅ is used) is difficult to measure (Pū 45 aḷav’ ariya vētattāṅ); he is mentioned as being realised by the four Vedas, although he creates (Po. 33,60 payanta) them at the beginning of each aeon. Further, the god is said to be like the melodies of the four Vedas (Po. 68 nāl vēta+ paṅ +akattāy) and is even identified with the Veda altogether. Pēyālvār reads: “He is the four Vedas that are well-recited” (Pē. 11 nanḱ’ ōtum nāl-vētatt’ uḷḷāṅ); “He who is the Veda in four parts” (Pe. 14 nāl-pāla vētattāṅ); “The one in the four Vedas” (Pē. 31 nāl-vētatt’ uḷḷāṅ). A key element in this context is the reduction of the Veda with its four parts to meaning this god alone. For example, Pēyālvār states that god is the inner/essential meaning of the Veda: “As the Veda, as the meaning of the Veda” (Pē. 39 marai ~āy marai poruḷ āy); “the inner meaning of the four Vedas that is him” (Pē. 84 uḷaṅ āya nāl maraiyiṅ uḷ poruḷai). Pūtattālvār equates the recitation of the name Nāraṅaṅ with the recitation of the Veda itself: “Reciting his names with the tongue is the Recitation” (Pū. 38 avaṅ pēr oṭuvatē nāviṅāl oṭtu).⁴

Reciting the name Nāraṅaṅ is not the only way to address this god. Because the god is – as will be demonstrated below – also present in the heart of the devotee, the language of the Antāti-s is direct and personal. The god is directly addressed several times as entai, “our father” (Po. 84; Pū. 57,63,70,87; Pē. 16,17,63,88). The poets seem like devotees themselves in their efforts to approach god. While no verse is described as being the words of god himself and no dialogue occurs in the Antāti-s, the poets do use the second person singular to address god directly, as in the words of Pūtattālvār 30: “You measured the world that day, Tirumāl, who became tall, you dug up the world that day, they say, that day you churned first the rain flood, then dammed the great sea, lord with a body [of the colour] of the great flood” (nī anr’ ulak’ aḷantāy nīṅṅa tirumālē nī anr’ ulak’ iṅantāy, enparāl, – nī anru kār ōtam mun kaṭaintu piṅ aṭaittāy mā kaṭalai pēr ōtam mēṅi pirāṅ).

It is obvious that a main intention of many verses in the Antāti-s is to demonstrate that the god being praised is a victorious and conquering being; no other being is able to protect or save worshippers from hell.⁵ Nonetheless, it can be demonstrated that also theological concepts are relevant. One such concept concerns the cosmological description of the god encompassing the universe on one hand, but also the core of the devotee, his heart, on the other. For the outer as well as the inner world, the god is identified with each element and remains in an eternal present. But the poets also point out that the god remains imperceptible. How is this theological category of gods transcending the human capacity of understanding realised by the three poets? Before I describe how the poets characterize the heart's approach to god and how the god is said to become manifest in the heart of a devotee, I will illustrate this cosmological aspect.

⁵ But the way to glorify god is manifold. It is also described how the god suffered. Thus, one verse mentions the sharpness of his struggles, saying that in the aftermath of the fight his palms, his feet and his fingers were scarred. Poykayālvār expresses this in verse 23: “Scarred were the palms that are such as have touched the bow string, scarred were the feet, having kicked the chariot, scarred were the fingers of him with the colour of the swelling flood who broke the chest of the one named for gold, so that she with the flower garland was frightened” (taḷump’ irunta cārṅkam nāṅ tōynta ām aṅkai, taḷump’ irunta tāḷ cakaṭam cāṅi, – taḷump’ irunta pūm kōtaiyāḷ veruva poṅ peyarōṅ mārpp’ iṅanta vūṅk’ ōta vaṅṅar viral).

Outside: The universe

The topos of the god measuring the world is frequently mentioned by all three Ālvārs: Indeed, he is all-encompassing because he measured the world. It is said that god measured the earth either with his huge form or parts of it (Po. 9 aḷanta maṇ; Po. 14 ulak' aḷanta; Po. 17 muṭiyum vicump' aḷantatu; Po. 76 maṇ aḷanta; Po. 84 ulak' aḷanta; Pū. 5 ulakam anr' aḷantāy; Pū. 9 aḷanta mā kaṭal cūl nālam; Pū. 23 aḷanta mā kaṭal cūl nālam; Pū. 30 nī ~anr' ulak' aḷantāy; Pē. 91 aḷantān). And as the one who measured everything, he comprises everything and is connected to everything.

Poykaiyālvār says that he is identical with the following elements: “The lord, the ground, the dark sky, the wind, the dashing flood and the red fire is he” (Po. 29 iraiyum nilanum iru vicumpum kārrum arai punalum cem tīyūm āvān); “O Tirumāḷ, who is sky, fire, churning sea, wind” (Po. 92 vān āki+ tī ~āy maṛi kaṭal āy mārutam āy). Another verse identifying the god with all outside elements is the following: “He is outside, this earth, the churning sea, the wind, the sky is he” (Po. 96 puram tān i+ maṇ tān maṛi kaṭal tān mārutam tān vān tānē).⁶

The earth is not only measured, it is also swallowed and spit out again. “Māyaṇ who has taken, eaten [and] spit out the world” (Pū. 36

maṅ koṅṭu maṅ uṅṭu maṅ umil̄nta māyan̄). Explaining what is swallowed by the god in more detail, the fact that he accomplishes this act is seen as making him immeasurable: “Earth, mountain, receding sea, wind and sky were swallowed that day, they say truthfully, by you with the discus whose fame is seen as of incalculable measure. Is it of this world’s measure, your mouth?” (Po. 10 maṅṅum malaiyum maṅi kaṭalum mārutamum viṅṅum viḷuṅkiyatu, mey eṅpar, eṅ-il alak’ aḷavu kaṅṭa cīr āliyāyḱku anru. iv ulak’ aḷavum uṅṭō uṅ vāy?).

The god is also described as identical to the elements, the senses of the human body, to knowledge, to sacrifice and to the Dharma instructions for good conduct, as seen for example in Po. 12: “The five sense organs, namely ear, mouth, eye, nose, body, and the five elements, namely red fire, earth, wind, water, sky, and unending knowledge and sacrifice and good Dharma, they say, are the nature of him.” (cevi vāy kaṅ mūkk’ uṭal eṅr’ aim pulanum, cem tī puvi kāl nīr viṅ pūtam aintum, – aviyāta nānamum vēḷviyum nal aṅamum eṅparē, ēnam āy ninrārḱ’ iyalvu.)

Despite the god being identified with each element, in praising the god’s immeasurability, the three poets point to the god’s inconceivability. While they mention how Māl measures the world, Poykaiyāl̄vār expresses in particular that his measuring cannot be perceived: “I don’t know the way you measured”. (Po. 3,4 arikelēn nī aḷavu kaṅṭa nerī). And the poets often mention that while the god’s names must be repeated, one cannot really know him through language. “Besides babbling so that just [his] names come [out], who will be those who know our Lord?” (Po. 56 pērē varap pitarral allāl em pemmānai ārē arivār). The god’s body is praised many times, but it cannot be perceived. “Can you see [and] know [his] body? Can you see [and] know the bird banner of him on the snake bed?” (Po. 85 paṭi kaṅṭ’ aritiyē? pāmp’ aṅaiyiṅān pul koṭi kaṅṭ’ aritiyē?). Fitting in this context is also Poykaiyālvār's statement: "When has the ocean been churned? Which earth did you receive along with water? Not even one thing do I understand." (Po. 2 enru kaṭal kaṭaintatu? ev ulakam nīr ērratu? onrum atānai uṇarēn nā). For all his deeds, the aspect of time is relevant, because whatever is done by the god has been completed, as suggested in this last verse, in a mythological prehistory. Even if the poets describe his identity with all things in every detail, the god is not identifiable as this or that (Pū. 1 avar ivar enr' illai). This is why it is said that it is not the god himself who is worshipped, but only his form (mūrṭti).

On the one hand, the three Ālvārs praise a god who defeated the dangerous Asuras and measured everything. But on the other hand, he is himself immeasurable. The descriptions stress the power of the god, whose qualities and deeds he shares with no other being. By virtue of his deeds, he and no other being should be worshipped. As is clearly stated by Poykaiyālvār, no other god provides refuge (araṇ) as he does, and no other god saves the devotee from karma. Evil actions disappear if one worships Māl: "If one considers you as protection, the evil actions disappear. If one considers you the bonds open and disappear. For those who think of you there is no age, Tirumāl." (Po. 75: kāpp' unṇai unṇak kaliyum aru viṇaikal. āpp' unṇai unṇa avilnt' oḷiyum. – mūpp' unṇai cintippārkk' illai, tirumālē, niṇ aṭiyai vantippār kāṇpar vaḷi). Often mentioned in this context is also the idea of hell (naraka). The god saves the devotee not only from suffering bad karma, but also from entering the seven hells. All three Ālvārs repeat that worshipping Tirumāl protects one from suffering in harsh hells. "They shall not be oppressed by karma, they shall not join hot hell ... they shall not, even by a trifle, go on evil paths – when they [fold their] hands in worship of the black one with red eyes, with a thousand names, the distant one, the one who is difficult to think of" (Po. 65 viṇaiyāl aṭarppaṭār, vem narakiṇ cērār, tiṇai

Inside: The heart

In addition to identifying the god with the outside world, the poets of the early Antātis discuss the heart: while the heart tries to comprehend the god, it can only reflect on the highest being by mentally seeing or imagining him. How is the god characterized when he is inside the heart? And how is the heart as his place described? Common terms in the Antāti-s' verses include the words neñcu (“heart”), uḷlam (“mind/heart”), maṇam (“mind/heart”), and cintai (“mind”). Indeed, the heart has a prominent place in much of Indian literature. In the Tivvyappirapantam the importance of this topos is no less.

Since the time of the Ṛg-Veda, the heart has appeared as a centre of the human being and is described as having a special function in relation to the other parts of the body.⁸ And yet, while it has this special function, it cannot appear outside the body. On the contrary, what is in the heart is restricted to an interior space.⁹ Mention of the heart is an expression of a process going on ‘inside’ the person, that is, one that is not outwardly observable. Further, something done ‘with the heart’ or happening ‘in’ or ‘close to’ the heart might indicate a strong (or, as we might say, ‘deep’) emotional or intellectual engagement in a person.¹⁰

⁷ Cf. also Po. 81, 87. Pū. 21,66, 93. Pē 3.

⁸ Cf. Sellmer 2000: 384ff.

⁹ In the Ṛg-Veda, in addition to Soma drinking, and often connected with it, a central thematic area in which heart language is used, is poetry. The heart is also compared to other words, the most important being mānas and krātu. Compare Oberlies 1999: 38: “Der Mensch ‘schaut (den Gott/das Loblied etc.) mit dem Herzen’ (RV 10.123.6), wo sich der Sitz des krātu befindet (‘In die Herzen hat Varuṇa die Geisteskraft ausgebreitet’, RV 5.85.2). Lieder (RV 3.26.8) und Soma (RV 9.73.8) läutern sich beide im Herzen, das somit eine ganz zentrale Version für die dichterischen Visionen spielt.”

The mystical function of the heart is elaborated upon in the Athārvaveda, which is linked to the well-known Upaniṣadic teachings of the cavity of the heart (guhā) and the heart-ether (antarhr̥daya akāśah) as seats of the key entities of Upaniṣadic speculations (puruṣa, ātman).¹¹ Moreover the heart is related to what is called satya, truth, as can be found in Bṛhadāraṇyaka-Upaniṣad 3.1.19.¹²

The heart provides a space in which either the self or, when expressed theistically, the highest being or self can dwell; it is thus compared to the cosmos itself, or it is said that the whole cosmos is contained within the space of the heart.¹³ The self within the heart, as a highest self, is clearly mentioned in the Śvetāśvatara Upaniṣad three times, in verses 3.13, 4.17, and 4.20.¹⁴ It is said that the god is present in the heart, and that by knowing the god one becomes immortal.

¹⁰ Cf. Sellmer 2000: 386.

¹¹ The relation between heart and space is found in: BĀU 2.1.17; 2.1.19; 3.9.21. ChU 8.1.1; 8.1.3; 3.14.24; 4.4.22. Cf. also Atharvaśikhā Upaniṣad 2.17.

¹² “Upon what is truth founded? On the heart, for one recognizes truth with the heart. So truth is founded on the heart” (kasmin nu satyaṃ pratiṣṭhitam iti. hr̥daya iti hovāca. hr̥dayena hi satyaṃ jānāti pratiṣṭhitam bhavatīti). Already prefigured by the concept of the antaryāmin in the BĀU, it is developed in the Subālopaniṣad, where it becomes a characteristic of the God Nārāyaṇa, who pervades everything and is also said to be present in everything that exists, above all in the heart of the devotee, who becomes immortal when he realizes Nārāyaṇa’s presence in his heart.

¹³ ChU 3.12.7–9

¹⁴ Olivelle 2006: 54.

Nonetheless, this does not imply that such a being becomes visible. These verses are probably the most important antecedents of the concept of heart in the works under discussion, and obviously carry a similar meaning. They are worth quoting: “The Person the size of a thumb abiding within the body always resides within the hearts of people. With the heart, with insight, with thought has he been contemplated. Those who know this become immortal.”¹⁵

And referring to a divine personal being in verse 20¹⁶ of the fourth Adhyāya, it is said: “His appearance is beyond the range of sight; no one can see him with his sight. He who knows him as such with his heart, with his mind – him, who abides in the heart – becomes immortal.”¹⁷

¹⁵ Quoted from Olivelle 2006: 64. anguṣṭhamātraḥ puruṣo ’ntarātmā, sadā janānām hṛdaye saṁniviṣṭaḥ | hṛdā manīṣā manasābhikṣpto ya etat vidur amṛtās te bhavanti ||. In the German translation of Oberlies 1996: 148: “Der daumengroße Puruṣa wohnt als inneres Selbst immerdar im Herzen der Menschen. Mit dem Herzen, mit geistiger Erregtheit, mit der Denkkraft wird er zur Anschauung gebracht. Diejenigen, die dieses wissen, werden unsterblich.”

This topos of identity between the heart and the god may have influenced the concept of heart as found in the Tivyappirapantam.¹⁸ The function or activities of the heart are described in various ways. The god who exists outside is also already present inside, at the place of the heart. The three Ālvārs reveal by means of different themes the eternal presence of the god in the heart. The poets describe what already exists: the abiding of the god in everything and thus also inside the heart.

When collecting references to heart/mind (neñcu/ullam), it becomes clear that the heart is not understood as an anatomical organ, but as an inner place within the devotee, a place where the god in his different forms is present. This is characterized in several ways: The heart is an inner place that can be addressed when the devotee speaks about himself in relation to the god – a relation that is expressed, according to Hardy, with verbs such as ul, ōr, and niñai, which all mean to think, meditate, or ponder.¹⁹ When the heart is addressed, the vocative is used. And when addressing it, it is personalized and individualized as “my heart”. In other cases, when the heart is requested to perform some task, this is done in the second person singular; whatever the heart does, its approach to god is the correct one.²⁰

¹⁸ With the exception of Hardy and a few details mentioned by Shulman (2012: 178–190), to my knowledge references to the expression of the heart have never been collected for the Tivyappirapantam. Although Shulman deals with later sources and focuses more on the term ullam, he points to the difference of a transcending form of knowledge (2012: 182):

¹⁹ Hardy has also pointed to the central meaning of heart in the early Antāti-s, arguing that it holds a fundamental religious role for the development of early bhakti. As far as the terminology of these three Antāti-s is collected in this volume, I see no evidence for the development of bhakti at this early stage. But for Hardy (1983: 301), “the Early Ālvārs ... are unique in fusing the temple worship with theistic yoga as a unified form of devotion.”

²⁰ What Hardy mentions here as ‘theistic yoga’ he considers a kind of internal

The mentioned uncertainty or lack of complete knowability of the god leads to the question of how the Antāti-s explain the way the god reveals himself to the devotee. Above all it is the devotee's heart in which the god is present. This is expressed in many ways: The devotee speaks to himself when he turns to his own heart as an inner place. The heart of the body is an inner place that can be addressed in the second person if the devotee speaks about the god, or himself in relation to the god. The heart is the only part of the devotee by which the god can be addressed or approached. It is the only agent that can do something in relation to the god and it sees directly without deviation and is never brought into contact with bad karma: "My unswerving heart, see the red-eyed Māl" (Po. 96 tirampāt' eṅ neñcamē cem kaṅ māl kaṅṭāy). "He is, see, good heart, the Highest, he is, see, in the heart of those who constantly remember you, he is, see, the one who is in the sea and inhabitant of Vēnkaṭam, hear: he is inside the heart." (Po. 99 ulaṅ kaṅṭāy nal neñcē uttaman, enrum ulaṅ kaṅṭāy ulluvār ullatt', – ulaṅ kaṅṭāy vellattin ullānum vēnkaṭattu mēyānum ullattin ullān enr' ōr. =

bhakti, which is based on the heart. For Hardy 'heart' becomes evident as a constitutive factor for the development of this kind of bhakti. He characterizes the heart (Hardy 1983: 292) as follows: "The actual locus where Kṛṣṇa abides and is realised is styled variously; most frequent are manam, cintai, neñcu/neñcam, and ullam. The denotations seem to flow into each other, and together they demarcate an area which we would describe as 'soul, intellect, mind, consciousness, self'." Hardy 1983: 83 continues with this idea: "Māyōṅ cannot be said not to be inside the soul; for everything, including man's own being and existence, depends upon his grace and his inner presence as antaryāmī. It is Māyōṅ's eternal nature to be there and think [of the world] 2,55; he is refuge (1,21 aṭai); he is support 4,8 tuṅai; the Ālvār can approach him 'like a calf looking for its mother' (1,30) and he sees him as bliss (4,59) and nectar (3,4)."

Pē. 40,1-2: uḷaṅ kaṅṭāy nal neñcē. uttamaṅ, enṛum uḷaṅ kaṅṭāy. uḷḷuvār uḷḷatt’ – uḷaṅ kaṅṭāy.) Another verse of Pēyālvār also mentions the presence of the god in the heart of the devotee: “Even if they say now that he is the Dark one, even if he is now difficult to see, he now is [already] inside [my] heart, he with the green-golden anklets who by [his] guile took the earth [and] crossed the sky” (ini ~avaṅ māyaṅ eṅa ~uraipparēlum ini ~avaṅ kāṅpu ariyaṅēlum – ini ~avaṅ kaḷḷattāl maṅ koṅṭu viṅ kaṅanta paim kalalāṅ uḷḷattin uḷḷē ~uḷaṅ*).

It is also important to point out that the god as described on the outside, in his different aspects and with all his qualities, is exactly the same as the god present inside the heart. This is illustrated in the following two verses of Pēyālvār: “As lord, as ground, as the eight directions he, as the Veda, the Veda’s meaning, as the sky is he inside [my] heart, the one from Vēṅkaṭam with sounding water, shining with waterfalls of a white superior to the crescent moon.” (Pē. 39 irai ~āy nilaṅ āki ~eṅ ticaiyum tāṅ āy marai ~āy marai poruḷ āy vāṅ āy – pirai vāyṅta veḷḷattu aruvi viḷaṅku* oli nīr vēṅkaṭattāṅ uḷḷattin uḷḷē ~uḷaṅ*.) “Inside those who think [of him] is he, see: the one from Vēṅkaṭam with swelling waterfalls where peaks are so high as to hide the sky, the king who secretly measured the earth.” (Pē. 40 uḷḷuvār uḷḷattu – uḷaṅ kaṅṭāy. viṅ +oṭuṅka+ kōṭu* uyarum vīṅku* aruvi vēṅkaṭattāṅ, maṅ +oṭuṅka+ tāṅ alanta maṅ*.)

If the heart is said to be seeing or is requested to “see”, this does not refer to the physical act of seeing in which one perceives an object. It means envisaging god mentally; as the devotee says, the god cannot be identified with this thing or that: “Envisage mentally, heart, the foot of him of sapphire colour, envisage mentally, again, his names, envisage mentally the colour of him of ocean water colour, who, rising from the great ocean, churned the [milk] sea” (Pū. 50 matik kaṅṭāy neñcē maṅi vaṅṅaṅ pātam matik kaṅṭāy marr’ avaṅ pēr taṅṅai – matik kaṅṭāy pēr āli-ninru peyarntu kaṭal kaṭainta nīr āli vaṅṅaṅ niraṁ). The heart of the devotee is consequently the only place where the awareness can grow that the god (here Nāraṅaṅ) can save the devotee from hell and bad karma. “Seeing” him with the heart, the devotee becomes clear of mind. As a consequence, the god may help him to leave “the ocean of affliction” (Po. 4). This is clearly expressed in the following verse 66 of Poykaiyālvar: “See this, good heart, this birth’s becoming. See this, all that we undergo. See this, as a reason not to come close to hell, reciting the names of Nāraṅaṅ. If you have the strength, see.” (Po. 66 itu kaṅṅāy nal neṅcē ~ip piravi ~āvatu. itu kaṅṅāy ellām nām urratu – itu kaṅṅāy nāraṅaṅ pēr oṭi narakatt’ aruk’ aṅaiyā kāraṅamum. vallaiyēl kāṅ). And when it is said that the god is really seen, this is not in reality, but in a dream of the devotee; seeing him – as mentioned above – means only seeing his form: “... I saw Nāraṅaṅ. In [my] dream I much saw him again for real/in the flesh.” (Pū. 81 nāraṅaṅai kaṅṅēṅ. kaṅaviṅ mika kaṅṅēṅ mīṅṅ’ avanaṅai meyyē.) “I saw in a dream the holy body” (Pū. 67 kaṅṅēṅ tiru mēṅi).

How the god is present inside must be realised inside the heart itself. Therefore, what is inside is expressed in various ways. If the heart “sees” inside, this is referring to a kind of visualization of something that has a true reality only when it has already “seen” inside. Thus, the heart that “sees” realizes a kind of inner awareness, an awareness of a divine reality that is already inside the heart. These statements point to the immanence of the god. Moreover, all three poets mention god’s “insideness.”²¹ The god already exists inside by having entered the ²¹ Po. 99: uḷḷattin uḷḷāṅ enr’ or. Realise: “he is inside [your] heart.” Pū. 28: maṅatt’ uḷḷāṅ Veṅkaṭattāṅ. The Lord of Veṅkaṭam is inside my mind. Pū. 95: eṅ neṅcam mēyāṅ, eṅ cenṅiyāṅ... heart. When the heart starts to reflect on the god, he is not there due to the devotee's reflection; before any reflection, the god is already present in the heart. Therefore, the activities of the heart begin at a special time. Even if it is said that god is present in the heart from "now on", there is no concrete time from when on he is present there; the devotee must accept that the god is "beginninglessly" immanent and will remain so. But whatever is described as an activity of the heart is in fact different from normal worldly activities; it is an interior process of imagination. The following quotations indicate that the presence of the god in the heart cannot be perceived, or is difficult to perceive. "Even though he is difficult to think by the heart, take a stand, my heart, speak" (Pē. 81 neñcāl niṇaiṇṇu ariyaṇēlum nilai perru* eṇ neñcamē, pēcāy*). This is even more evident in the following words of Pēyālvār: "When perceiving [him] he is difficult to perceive.²² Even when he has entered [our] heart [and] connected [with us] his nature is difficult to see" (Pē. 82 uṇaril uṇarvu ariyaṇ. uḷlam pukuntu puṇarilum kāṇṇu* ariyaṇ uṇmai*). "Even if they say now that he is the Dark one, even if he is now difficult uḷḷēy uḷaṇ Vēṅkaṭattān. The one from the Vēṅkaṭam is in the heart/mind. Pē. 40: uḷḷuvār uḷḷatt' uḷaṇ kaṇṭāy ... Vēṅkaṭattān. In the minds of those who think [of him] is he, see: the one from the Vēṅkaṭam. Pē. 83: uḷḷattin uḷḷēy uḷaṇ. He is in the inside. Pē. 84: uḷḷatt' uḷaṇ.

to see, he now [already] is inside [my] heart, he with the green-golden anklets who by [his] guile took the earth [and] crossed the sky.” (Pē. 83 ini ~avan māyaṅ eṇa ~uraipparēlum ini ~avan kāṅpu ariyaṅēlum – ini ~avan kallattāl maṅ koṅṭu viṅ kaṭanta paim kaḷalāṅ uḷlattin uḷḷē ~ulaṅ.*) “Who are those in the world that understand [him] by thought?” (Pē. 93 niṅaittu ulakil ār teḷivār?*)

The next step is therefore that the poet addresses the heart that should realise that the god is inside the heart. The following examples illustrate how the three poets express the activities (emerge, rise for the heart to realize his approach to the god, who will never become an object of daily perception).

A last central and special topic should be mentioned: the heart as the temple of the god. If the heart is the god's temple, his being in the heart can be realised.²³ The parallel of the god's presence in a temple and in the heart is expressed in Pū. 54: "Thinking 'don't abandon the temporary temple in the flood', I remember, having kept it in [my] heart as [my] inner temple, as a station equal in essence [to those] that you esteem as stations, [namely] both these: Iruñcōlai [and] Vēñkaṭam that are mountains." (verp' enr' iruñcōlai vēñkaṭam enr' i~ +iraṇṭum nirp' enru nī matikkum nīrmai pōl – nirp' enr' uḷam kōyil uḷlam vaitt' uḷlinēn vellatt' iḷaṅkōyil kaiviṭēl enru.) Another example in which all the places where the god abides are internalized in the heart is the following: "In the heart of his people are Tañcai as the first, [Tiruv]araṅkam, Taṅkāḷ, in the heart of his people are the cool [Vēñkaṭa] mountain, the [milk] sea, in the heart of his people are Māmallai, Kōval and ramparted Kuṭantai, they say, the places of our Father who has the power of command." (tamar uḷlam tañcai talai ~araṅkam taṅkāḷ tamar uḷlum taṅ poruppu vēlai – tamar uḷlum māmallai kōval matil kuṭantai ~enparē ~ēvalla ~entaikk' iṭam.) And still another example is found in Pē. 94: "Softly, unfailingly entering into my heart, the Dark one stands, sits [and] lies [there]." These passages indicate the ultimate identity of the heart with the god who is placed in the heart, the heart which is his temple; like this, also other places of the god become a place in the heart.²⁴ Whatever can be revealed or seen mentally by the devotee, his/

²³ This important topic has already been mentioned by Hardy (1983: 297): "In a curious way, the Early Ālvārs construct a parallel between Māyōṅ's presence in the heart and in the temple."

²⁴ In this topic of the heart as the Lord's temple, Hardy (1983: 298) sees a personal form of the arcāvatāra, i.e. remaining manifestation. This might be the early influence of the Pāñcarātra. For him this means that love and her heart is the centre by which he can address the god and by which the god can become visible.

At the beginning of my epilogue I have described the image of god of these first three early Antāti-s as distinctive theology. In the meantime the result might be gained that this consists in a special way of identifying the uniqueness of the one god with everything, i.e. the inner and outer world of the devotee. Despite manifold equations the god is not made available to human knowledge, but remains withdrawn from sensual perception. God's all-encompassing omnipresent nature is revealed in his manifestations as Veda, but especially in his manifestation outside as elements, temples, places, but also in divine manifestations as well as in the inwardness of man, i.e. the heart.

In conclusion, it can be said that the central topic of theology, i.e. the obvious contradiction between divine eternity and temporality,²⁵ is also an important theme of the poets. Its accomplishment contributes to the development of a theology of the Aḷvārs, which in poetic semantic expressions finds new forms of speaking to god and about god.

passion, which are stimulated in the heart by the sensuous experience of the temple vigraha, i.e. the god as being manifest in the form of a temple, encounter and encompass the Lord who abides in the heart.

²⁵ For the theological implications one may point here to Raimon Panikkar's artificial term of "tempiternity", which describes the paradox of the presence of an eternal Being in a concrete manifestation; for further explanation cf. Panikkar 2010: 98-99; 226-227; 286-289.

Glossary: Three Antāti-s

The entries are divided into lemmas consisting of a verbal root or (pro) nominal base form, given in the Tamil alphabetical order. This means that, for example, every pronoun belonging to the pronominal deictic stem a is found under the entry a, every verb form belonging to the verb cey is found under the entry cey. A noun with a case ending can be a lemma only if the base form is not attested in the corpus. Each entry identifies the reference of the lemma with respect to the dictionaries, mainly the DEDR and the TL, followed by a morphological analysis, an English translation and all the occurrences in the three Antāti-s. The list of abbreviations is found at the beginning of this book; surprising/diagnostic transitional forms are marked by a triple exclamation mark.
